ACROSS THE RIVER.
In my way on the physical geography of America, the States of Virginia and Kentucky are depicted as being contiguous to the State of Ohio, and separated from it only by the river of that name. That river, too, as we can all remember, was once made to appear a very doubtful matter, even as a river, by a celebrated geologist of certain mood and witty speech. But whatever may be thought of the Ohio river, whether it be just what Randolph represented it, or not, the political and social geographer has in its broadness the connection between the ten States first named and the State of Ohio.

We have just now before us the Annual Meeting of Governor Dawson, and so we thought of the river again, when we recalled the Message of the Governor of our own State, which we know that if any man in either of the neighboring States named, with but a grain of common sense, would read one of these documents carefully, and consider the facts of progress which they set forth—progress so great as to almost without exception parallel to the world's history, and indeed altogether so, till even geologists and geographers would be forced to give up their old notions, and other logic, than the comparison of the facts here and there, a comparison which we must inevitably make too, in order that he should stand on the right side of the river, and not on the wrong side.

In the State, there is no other river which is so important as the Ohio. It is the main artery of the State, and the lifeblood of the people. It is the river that has made the State what it is, and it is the river that will make the State what it is to be in the future. It is the river that has made the State what it is, and it is the river that will make the State what it is to be in the future. It is the river that has made the State what it is, and it is the river that will make the State what it is to be in the future.

The whole of the State is in the hands of the Ohio river. It is the river that has made the State what it is, and it is the river that will make the State what it is to be in the future. It is the river that has made the State what it is, and it is the river that will make the State what it is to be in the future. It is the river that has made the State what it is, and it is the river that will make the State what it is to be in the future.
