But Admiral Millers will hardly be permitted to esiablish a rule, the enforcement of which could not fall to involve his government in a serious difficulty; for we have not a doubt but that any attempt to interfere with that blockade by Great Britain, or any other foreign power, would be promptly and steraly resisted.

It will soon become obvious to those who are so very anxious to get at the cotton, that the shortest way to it will be through ports covered by the flag of the United States. A few weeks more will restore unrestricted trade to all the ports north of Charleston, provided such men as Admiral Miller will case tampering with the blockade which the government has laid as the most efficient means of crashing out this rebellion—one which is not a whit less wicked than was the Sopoy mutiny in India, and in justification of which not half as much can be urged.
