WEDNESDAY MORNING, JULY 17, 1861. A Cheering View of the Present and the A Cheering View of the Present and the Patture.

On the 30th of June last the indebtedness of the government, funded and unfunded, amounted to the sum of about $400,000,000, and should this ear continue, one year longer the national debt will be swellen to the formidable aggregate of $700,000,000, requiring an annual expenditure of over $40,000,000 to pay the interest. the same time manufacturing enterprise will advance steadily and surely under the wholesome protection which the government will be obliged to afford. The policy will no longer be fitful and fluctuating, but must be maintained so long as the nation is heavily in debt.

The national debt of Great Britain is in round numbers $4,000,000,000, or about six times as heavy as ours is likely to be; yet this enormous briden has not at all retarded the progress of that great nation. Since the close of the ware of the first Napoleon, when the greater part of it was contracted, its population has nearly doubled; the wealth has more than doubled. It is a permanent burden—an Englishman no more thinks of paying off the debt than he does of abolishing the government. In fact this vast mass of funded wealth is the strongest buttrees the government has, and its half-yearly pulsationshits those of the beart in the animal system, send streams of golden infe-blood to every part of the realm. A national debt due to foreigners is impoverishing; but if the people of nation are its creditors, it is invigorating, and also gouce of both prosperity and stability.

This great national trouble is something like

Namy of the Northern Colleges have been so collicious to make themselves "all right" with "Southern men," that we should not be surprised to find any number of their graduates in the same and in the councils of the facels, but it may be considered highly probable that the late melancholy accident to his much-loved deughter, Mrs. Longellow, was word to say against "the peculiar institution"—insert to hint that the wicest and best men both of this and all other countries have described it always as a political, moral and social evil of stipenedous magnitude—such was the needfal qualification of Echocle of Colleges that it might receive in charge the son or the daughter of a Elswkholder. And as several Northern Sohols and Colleges digraced themselves by accepting the conditions—so have they to bear shell be completed in the counties was the madness and workedness of their treases.
