WEDNESDAY MORNING, AUG. 21, 1861.

An Extraordinary Story—Love and Marriage.

London has had two horrible sensations to occupy its attention during the last month—one the Waldl case, whose progress we have chronicled for our readers; and by the latest arrival we get the conclusion of another affair as strange and full of passion as any that is recorded in the annals of crime. On the 12th of July, Major Murray, until recently an officer of the Hussars, and now a Director in a wealthy Stock Company, was accosted in the public streets by a man who was an entire stranger to him. The new comer, introduced himself under the name of Grey; said he wanted to loan money for a client, to the company of which Murray was a director; offered £60,000, and requested the Major to walk into his (Grey's) office; it was up one pair of stairs, and in a back room, in a public and respectable street, but Murray had never before been in the house. He followed, however, into the office and seated himself, when some unimportant business conversation took place, occupying not more than a minute or two. Roberts (the real name of the stranger) rose to get his card of address, which the other had asked for. The doors were closed, Murray sat with his back to Roberts, who pretended to be looking for a card. Presently Murray felt a slight touch in the back of his neck, there was a report of a pistol, and he dropped off his chair on the ground, perfectly paralyzed; in a moment, Roberts came up and seeing that his victim still lived, fired a pistol into Murray's right temple; this did not kill, but he pretended to be dead, and when Roberts walked away, seized a pair of long lying near, sprang to his feet, and struck at the wretch. He raised his arm, and a terrible struggle ensued; Roberts fell under, and Murray hit him several times in the face and on the head with the tongs, getting his own knees on Roberts' chest. Then Roberts got away the tongs, and Murray seized a black bottle, but it was smashed to pieces in one blow. The two wounded men, both streaming with blood, contrived both to get to their feet and another struggle took place; finally Murray got possession of the tongs, and by a succession of heavy blows thought that he had killed his adversary, knowing that his own life was at stake. He then found the door locked, and clambered out of the window, to a policeman, ignorant all the time whether he should not meet confederates of his would-be murderers. Help was got, Murray taken to an hospital, and Roberts discovered.

For nearly a fortnight the mystery remained unravelled. Roberts did not die for a day or two, but nothing could be learned from him; Murray persisted in declaring that they had never met before. Roberts' family could furnish no clue to the affair, but at last a woman who had been supposed to be Murray's wife, gave information that explained it all. She is, in reality and has been for years, his mistress, although this fact has not been generally known. Roberts was jealous, and anxious to have the woman elope with him to the continent, proposing to desert his own wife. There can be no doubt that Roberts' passion for the mistress of Murray provoked him to the endeavor to get Murray out of the way.

A Varied Life.—The New York correspondent of the London Star says that Mr. William Henry Hurlbut, who is now a prisoner among the rebels, "is well known in England as a friend of the Rev. Charles Kingsley, and a contributor to some of the English magazines and reviews. Born in South Carolina, educated in New York, Germany, and France, and an extensive traveler through, as well as resident in, half a dozen other countries, Mr. Hurlbut had become a thorough cosmopolitan. He was a polished and versatile writer, and early turned his attention to the press. Six or seven years ago he was editor of Putnam's Magazine. He has been theatrical critic of the Albion (English paper of New York) for a long time, contributing to its columns some of the most delightful 'feuilletons' I ever read. He was the author of the Anti-Slavery articles that appeared in the Edinburgh, I think, some time in 1854. He eventually settled down as assistant editor of the New York Times, which he left last summer in consequence of suddenly breaking out into the worst kind of Secessionism. He has boxed the compass of everything; has been a Unitarian minister, a muscular Christian, a free-thinker, a native of a slave State, a violent abolitionist, a Secessionist, and is at last a captive in durance vile on a charge of being a Northern spy."

The name of Beauregard, the Rebel General-in-Chief, having penetrated to Mexico, the Diario di Mejico furnishes some biographical information concerning him. This authority states that the grandfather of Beauregard was a Mexican bandit, called Bonegallo, who acquired great wealth by his depredations in the mountains of Sierra Madre. At his death the gang broke up, and his son, Bonegallo, Jr., emigrated to New Orleans, where he bought two large estates; the first he called Touton, and the second Beauregard: hence his name of Touton Beauregard. Subsequently, he was fortunate enough to marry a lady of high parentage, and at once acquired great influence among the foreign population of Louisiana. As with his property, so with his offspring; the first child was named Touton, the second Beauregard, and so on with all the children alternative. In the year 1831 or 1832, he obtained for his fourth son an admission into the Military Academy at West Point, under the appellation of G. T. Beauregard. This fourth son is the man now General-in-Chief of the Rebels.

Johnson and Johnston.—There are, or recently were, no less than six prominent Southern men bearing these names. They are so often confounded, that the reader will be pleased to have the position of each defined. Lieut. Col. Benj. J. Johnson, of the South Carolina Hampton Legion, was killed in the battle of Bull Run. General Albert S. Johnston, late of the U. S. army in Utah, is in command of the Confederate army of the Shenandoah. General Joseph E. Johnston is in command of the Confederate army of the Potomac. General Johnston, late commander of the Pacific Department, in California, has crossed overland with a party of Secessionists to join the Confederate army in Virginia. In addition are the United States Senators Johnson of Missouri, and Johnson of Tennessee. The last named will, in no case be likely to be mistaken for any of the Johnsons in the Confederate service.

A Good Story of Admiral Northup.—Adjutant General Sanborn relates that when the Minnesota regiment was drawn up in line of battle opposite to the Mississippi regiment, the wagon master of the Minnesota regiment, our old friend Anson Northup, was in the ranks with musket in hand. The regiment, practicing the Zouave drill, in which Ans. is not very proficient, fell flat on the ground after the first round—every man killed as Northup thought. Resolved to have another shot at the rebels, Northup re-loaded his musket, and just after he fired, up jumped his comrades and fired another round, so much to Northup's surprise, he said, as if so many dead men had come out of their graves.—[Minnesota Paper.

It is a fact which must arrest the attention of the people, that the action of the Government to put down rebellion, and not the rebellion itself, is what the secession sympathisers find fault with.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—The extraordinary efficacy of this unrivalled preparation in all cases of scrofula, erysipelas, rheumatism and stomach disorders, and other maladies, would appear almost incredible, were not such wonderful cures of daily occurrence certified by persons of unquestioned truth and respectability, which fully demonstrate that in this class of disorders as an alterative and renovating agent it is unequalled.

Eminent physicians have proved by long experience that they can produce the happiest results by its administration, and therefore use it with confidence.
