The Secure of Maxion and Stidell.

We gave our opinion very brifty yesterday that the esisture of these rebels by Commodore Wilkes was not contrary to the law of mations, but so far as England is concerned, entirely in accordance therewith, her own practics in time of war and the opinions of her highest legal authorities so deciding. To state this dogmatically, however, is not as satisfactory to the reader as a citation from some work of authority on this special subject. We had determined to undertake this very labor of searching for such precedents, an our books might supply, but happening to find the work done to contrary, to show that the views we ventured to set forth years the days of the following, to show that the views we ventured to set f

Armed thus with the latest advices from England, the Senator sped in a 1 haste to Washington, and immediately called upon the President. On asking the President how matters seemed, he was informed that prospects were hopeful at home, but dark, very dark, in the direction of England. "Whola's the matter there?" he inquired. "Hom. Mr.—
