The President on the Slavery Ques-A Washington correspondent of the N. Y.

Evening Post Bays: "The passage in the message which refers to the slavery question will not produce any division in Republican ranks, as the President evidently refers the whole matter to Congress for its careful consideration. In private conversation the President expresses himself as undecided upon the question. He says: This is a great question, and one I do not feel competent to settle. Let Congress consider it, not passionately—not with reference to any former political issues—but seriously and prudentage and thus circumstantial. President evidently refers the whole matpolitical issues—but seriously and prudent-ly, and thus give me its advice either in the , and thus give me its butter cities.
