We knew that the rebel Gen. Jackson had appeared in that region with a considerable force, that Gen. Landra fallen back from Romney, and that there had been several skirmishes, and considerable cannonading, and that was about the extent of our knowledge. The following extract of a letter, which we copy from the New York Herald, contains the first extended intelligible account of the late proceedings in that quarter, and will be read with interest. We have never been able to see why Gen. Banks has not been permitted to occupy Winchester long ago, and thus effectually have protected the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and delivered the Eastern end of the Virginia Valley from secession control. Beauregard would thus be threatened in the rear, and Manassas, if not three sides. An army at Winchester, having railroad communications with Baltimore, could as easily be supplied as in its present position. However, Gen. His force has been variously stated. At first, when he began to move from Winchester towards Martinsburg, it was supposed it might amount to 5,000 men, half starved and illy clad, as the rebels are always represented. After he had reached Martinsburg, and was advancing towards Bath, it was discovered that he had 10,000 men; but it was said only part of them were regulars, and it was was at an wag a tongue or wield a pen we was a wag a tongue or wield a pen we was and act to his order. The fact is, he has under two been made to stand still and he had shelled Hanceck and was marching on Romney, it was supposed that he might have seventeen regiments, or about afteen thousand men. The fact is, he has under his immediate orders at least twenty thousand well disciplined and effective troops. His orders were to clear that part of Virginia between Harper's Ferry and the Western line of Maryland of the presence of Union troops; to destroy whatever part of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad might have been rebuilt, between the South branch of the Potomac river and Hanceck; and to prevent the reconstruction of that road at all hasards. "At the time General Jackson began his march towards Martinsburg, the Fifth and Fourteenth Connecticut regiments were at Hancock, and 500 cavalry with two pieces of cannon, at Bath. The telegraph had just sent all over the country the comfertable assurance that "the route of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad is completely guarded, and all is safe." On the 3d of January, the Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania regiment and the Thirty-ninth Illinois regiment were sent to Bath; but the whole Union force was driven from that place on the 4th, after a sharp skirmish, in which the Union troops behaved most gallantly. The latter retreated across the Potomac into Maryland, leaving thirty prisoners in the Maryland, leaving thirty prisoners in "Day follows day, and in lieu of being the season of the statement of January, the Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania regiment and the Thirty-ninth Illinois regiment were sent to Bath; but the whole union force was driven from that place on the statement of the statement of the statement of the cause likely to prosper."

The Situation on the Upper Potomac.
For some time back the news that has reached us from the region between Harper's Ferry and Cumberland, along the Potomac and the realized, on both sides of the Potomac and the realized, on both sides of the river, and from that to between Harper's Ferry and Romney, in Virginia, has been of such a fragmentary and indefinite dispatch from Washington, informing him that there was an urgent necessity for more troops in Western Virginia, without an instant's delay. The Governor replied on Saturday morning that 12,000 lot troops, including a regiment of cavelry, would be ready to start on Sunday night. But on Friday night Gen. McClellan had received a dispatch from Gen. Lander, stating that he had evacuated Romney. As the additional troops had been wanted for the defense of that place, Gen. McClellan telegraphed back to the Governor of Ohio on Sturday an order countermanding the march of the Ohio troops for the present. They have since, however, received orders to march to Cumberland, and are probably now there.
