Mr. Cowan's Speech.

We give the main argument of this extra ordinary production to-day. We cannot suffer ourselves now to characterize it as it deserves. We feel too deeply mortified at the Republicans of Western Pennsylvania, by And yet Congress has power to make and whom Mr. Cowas was presented as a candil unmake alike Naglee and Keese. whom Mr. Cowas was presented as a cand date for the Senate. A fatal mistake has been committed. The powerful Republican najority of this section of the State supposed they had in Mr. Cowan a true and able exponent of Republican principles, one who would retrieve the tarnished honor of the State, and redeam it from the disgrace inflicted by such ment as Broller and Bucharan. How the mistake happened we do not know. Those who were active in pressing his claims have much to answer for to the party. The mistake cannot new be rectified, and must be before as best it may.

All of Mr. Cowan's votes and speeches so alloyed satisfaction to the sympathizers with secession in Congress—the Vallandighams and Powells and Saulsburys-and to the halfdisloyal press everywhere; while his course has grieved the Republicans, to whom he owes his position, beyond expression.

There was a smart though pleasant retort of words between Gen. Tilghman of the rebel army and United States Marshal J..., who conducted him to Fort Warren. The General told the Marshal that he should like to see Bunker Hill. When the steamer which carried off the prisoners to the fort had got so far off from the shore that Bunker Hill monument loomed up in the distance in all its majesty, the rebel General looked at it, and said that if he was to be executed, he should like to be hanged from that spot. "Your request cannot be allowed," said the UnderMarshal, "the ground upon which that monumont was creeted has been cancerated to freedom. General Warren fell there—it is no place for you." The southern General did
