THE BATTLE OF PITTBEURGE LANDING .--- We give up much of our space, to-day, to incidents of the battle of Pittsburgh Landing, written by a special corresponde

Strategy. The significance of the recont expediti up the Rappahannock seems to be, that al munchausenisms will no longer avail to hold our armies at bay.

After a long and costly experience, in Note a log and costs of power, and here seen a cost of the point, and the People of the country, were, at length aroused from further ac-quiescence in military do-nothingism, and the Presidentissuel his order in February, that the armies matanore. Great of course was the fluttering of the indignant and re-calcitrant throng of military martinets, pointing and other interested partising, who had been for months suc-cessful, inaugurating a kind of military supremay in the name of Gen McCLELLAN. The sweets of great actual power, and the flattering hopes of still sweeter possessions volving the loss of all that was possible to flattering hopes of still sweeter possessions when still greater powers could be usurped, were surely hard enough to surrender. But the President was inexorable, the Secretary of War was inexorable, and Congress and the country were, if possible, till more inexorable. There was, therefore, nothing for it but submission, or resignation-and, as the latter alternative was not pressed-perhaps hardly hinted at, or at most not very indirectly presented

-of course, the choice was submission But in carrying forward the role of submission, the rols of ambition was not forgotten. The echoes of the many-voiced organs o partizanship are yet lingering around us, and prolonging their dying cadences in the editorial columns of all the hypocritical semi-loysi, and in one or two even of the equal to Gen. McClellan's, and, therefore owlish conservative journals, in various paris of the country.

They have been losing artillery in large quantities, and their facilities for making it are very deficient. They cannot have either an army, or arms, or artillery, or any preparations equal to Gen.
