Quite a fleet of steamors and vessels loaded with troops were discovered in the distance, and a pursuit was commenced, resulting in the capture of some of them, whilst others were run ashors and fired by those on board, who escaped to the woods.

It is said that by three o'clock in the aftermoon the gunboais had reached West Point at the head of the navigation, nearly 30 mites above Yorktown, frequently shelling the parties of the enemy that were discovered flying along the shore, and flanking that portion of the retreating army that were moving towards West Point to take the railroad to Richmond. Immediately in the wake of the gunboats followed a long line of river steamors loaded with troops, carrying Gen. Franklin's Division, with 15,000 to 20,000 men. These troops reached Yorktown during the afternoon, and stopped there to await intolligence from the gunboats. It is proposed to land them at Yorktown, if the reports of the gunboats are favorable.
