Important from Fremont's Command.

Battle of McDowell - Details of the Battle of McDowell.

The Wheeling Intelligence, of yesterday, contains an interesting account of the late important movements in Gen. Fremont's Department, the details of which are furnished by Lieutenant Henry H. Pickett, of Mansfield, Ohio, who witnessed the battle of McDowell, on the 18th inst., between the forces under Gen. Milroy and Schenck, and the enemy under Jackson.

Our forces consisted of nine regiments in all, six under Milroy and three under Schenck, numbering not over ten thousand men.

Those under Milroy were the 75th, 174th, 22d and 24th Ohio, and the 2d and 3d Virginia. Those under Schenck were the 52d and 54th Ohio, and the 5th Virginia. It appears that Milroy's force was drawn from Monterey in the direction of Staunton as far as McDowell, two regiments ten miles beyond and one sixteen miles before noon on the 18th, the pickets of this advanced regiment were driven in, and it fell back upon the other two. They all fell back in good order to within a mile and a quarter of McDowell, where they were met by the enemy, who were lined up a quarter of a mile from the mountain when the main fight began. The enemy were posted on the top of a mountain, which terminated abruptly on our left. Milroy's forces were disposed in front of the mountain some distance along, with the batteries on the flanks and the rear. There were five batteries, Capt. Taylor's, Capt. Schenck's, Capt. Ewing's, Capt. Brown's and another not remembered by our informant.

Our batteries were particularly brilliant execution, being about upon a level with the enemy. His shells fell about at the right time and the right place, and in clearing a space of about thirty feet in the front of the rebel position, the batteries, as an instance of this officer's skill, that seeing a group of rebel officers on an eminence, he ordered the batteries to get up and sent them a shell, which killed two out of four. This shell was placed on the other side of the mountain, and the enemy were unable to take up each gun. The enemy fired nothing, and the batteries were unable to get their guns to the top of the mountain on which they were posted. They, however, fired a few shells, but the shells fell on the side of the mountain, but fortunately, as the shells were in the air, they were engaged with others in hearing the killed and wounded, and the enemy were not near them. They were killed and in danger of being captured.

At seven o'clock in the evening, Gen. Schenck's brigade came up, having left Frankfort at six o'clock, and landed at ten o'clock at night. Shortly after the 22d and 24th Ohio made a brilliant charge on the mountain in the face of the enemy's fire, and captured the position. The enemy were much to their surprise found a battery in reserve on the other side of the mountain. They fell back, and the enemy had come around the flank termination of the mountain, and flanked our force. The 24th Ohio was posted on the left, and the weight of this flank movement fell upon them. They were really in a very bad way, and were considerably out of their ammunition gear, and they stood upon the field and waited for the rest of the army to come up.

Upon the discovery that the enemy were in a great number in numbers, our force fell back in good order about 9 o'clock, and the rebels at least a Roland for their own. Our loss amounted to 100 killed and 160 wounded. That the enemy was believed to be much larger, from the fact that our men, being up hill, were more secure than the enemy, and on account of the terrible execution of the shells, the enemy were not near them, and came in after the fight, declared that their loss was 400 killed, besides the wounded.

While the battle was going on a couple of companies from the Virginia regiments left McDowell to guard baggage and provisions, and who had orders to fall back, were attacked with such success that they were obliged to fall back on the double quick and leave everything in the hands of the enemy. The 24th Virginia, left behind a trunk containing "Lithograph" and other articles, and effect-the audience joining in the chorus. A unanimous vote of thanks was tendered to the brave soldiers.
