Gen. Banks' Retreat. Some inconsiderate and thoughtless persons, on the first news of Banks' retreat, were inclined to blame him. So far from awe know that when McClellan's campaign on the peninsula was disarranged, the reason assigned was that the reappearance of a strong rebel force in the Shenandoah Valley made it necessary to retain the army under Banks and Shields there. And this in turn necessitated the keeping of this, in turn, necessitated the keeping of McDowell in front of Washington."

The same correspondent further says that right. Banks was deprived of nearly his entire army against his carnest protest, and that take with him the whole army of the Potomae, but the presence of the enemy in strong force in the Valley required Banks to remain to hold what he had obtained, and McDowell was kept with his Division for the protection of Washington, and he was sent down to Fredericksburg, to be within co-operating distance with McClellan, and at the same time be in a position to protect Washington. Vielding afterwards to the solicitation of McClellan, the President took Franklin's Division from McDowell, and sent it to the Peninsula. This left McDowell too weak to carry out the design of marching on Bichmond, to assist McClellan, or to defend Washington against transfer were withers and the Commander-in-Chief on the other, but of foreign consuls have had a conference in reference to the circumstances above narof marching on Bichmond, to assist Mc-Ciellan, or to defend Washington against sudden dash of the enemy, and Banks was then stripped of his troops, and ordered to fall back to Strasburg, which has railroad connections with Washington,

If Banks had been reinforced, and had been enabled to move on to Staunton, and seize the railroad there, and the whole army of the Potomac had moved to Richmond in two divisions by way of Frederloksburg and Gordonsville, it appears to us the grand object of taking Richmond would have been accomplished quite as well as by adopting the route by the Peninsula. Gen. Fremont and Gen. Banks A letter from Washington to the N. Y. Evening Post, says:

The attempt of certain parties here to make Gen. Fremont responsible for the retreat in the Shenandoah Valley is contemptible. The government is fully satisfied with the conduct of Fremont. He was made here upon Fremont in connection with the late disasters are generally understand to be made by men who desire to divert the attention from other generals.

Gen. Banks is in great favor with the government to day. His retreat is regarded as a massionly success, under all the circumstances. Mr. Stanton's order, which was read to the few troops under General Banks, at Williamsport, and which elicited so much spplanse, was full of praise for their conduct on the retreat.

Secret Feeling in Alexandria. A letter from Alexandria, to the New York Commercial, says:
Alexandria would rebel to-day if it dared Certain it is that this plan would have avoided the disaster of losing the Valley, and of entailing great distress on the Union men there.

Some of the New York papers are assailing in with a group of rather doubtful tones discussing something with great interest, I wormed myself intering of the Stanton. We cannot see how he is to blame. In fact, we particularly blame no one. All, doubtless, were acting for the best. If there has been an error in judgment, it is in undertaking an advance on Richmond by a route which required more men than the Government could supply, without endangering other important would replet to day if it dared. Alling in with a group of rather doubtful tooking men, who were carnestly but in low tones discussing something with great interest, I wormed myself under graces by a judicious distribution of those potent humanizers, good cigars, and by the set of "Lincoln" for "President," &c., &c., the paper ment.
