He therefore gave no rest to his wearied soldiers, and accepted the gage of battle wherever it was thrown down: Jackson was compelled to fight on Sanday, and thus log a day; but on Monday he posted to the Shenandon, at Port

There is much discussion here concerning the unfortunate failure to burn the bridge at Port Republic. The friends of Col. Carrolt, commanding the advance brigade of Shields' division, insist that he was not ordered to the task on the formant alleges that Carroll refused to apply the torch, believing too confidently in his power to prevent the rebels crossing. He erected very slight fortifications, and woke up in the morning to find that the their last hope of escape

A correspondent of the New York Evening Post, writing from Fremont's army,

Had we known that Carroll had failed to burn the bridge at Port Republic, day-break would have found us assailing our already defeated foe. A fatal mistake, for he held it more than half an hour, and permitted Jackson to occupy the heights overlooking and completely commanding the valley where lay his little army.

Jackson shelled them out easily, and moved his whole force across the bridge. Our cavalry and infantry advance arrived upon the ground to see the wide plain covered with a confused mass of wagons, caverage and stragoling men. An hour later, slry and straggling men. An hour and our artillery were sending their burst-ing shells into the few wagons in sight, slowly winding away into the distant for-pursuit of Jackson when we knew beyond a peradventure that his force more than twice outnumbered our own, is there in all history, and, to say the least, in the experience of this war, another such examp of superior generalship and successfu daring?

We supposed for some time that McDowcit was co-operating with us, or at least Banks would advance and reinforce our wearied army. The only movement made was the sending of Shields with a misersble little corporal's guard of two thousand five hundred men, called a "flying column." Think of a flying column with two and a half miles of wagons trailing behind them.
The morning after the battle we moved cautiously over ground totally strange to us, so perfectly adapted to the enemy for defense. At sunset and during the night. defense. At sunset and during the night, the retreat of the rebels took place. They fell on Carroll in the morning, overwhell ing his handful of men; bayoneting the poor fellows to their heart's content, they followed them to Luray, and to-day there are not one hundred soldiers left of Carroll's famous flying column. The only re-deeming feature in this affair was the saving of the trains, they wore, withdrawn in time to escape Jackson's clutches.

Another correspondent, writing from Several persons—officers and men—who were in Shields advance, are now here, and they tell a sad story. The men were wern out with long marches and scanty food, and were more than a heavy day's march in advance of the main body of troops under Shields. Gen. Carroll, who commanded the advance, states with positiveness that he had unmistakable orders not to burn Port Republic bridge. This

The rebels fought with a terrible desperation, for they knew it was Union on condition that the boundaries be Ashley admitting West Virginia into the Union, on condition that the boundaries be extended to the Blue Ridge, and that she abolish slavery forthwith. NOTICE TO TEACHERS.—New petition for labor, more than the slave who is compelled to toil from daylight to dark, from one year's end to the other? As slaves, the blacks do all that flesh and blood can do. As free men, they can do no more. All the talk, then, about their coming into competition with white men, is so much bosh.

If the Post is going to build up its old, defeated, and effete party, on the ground of preserving and strengthening human slavery, it will have a happy time of it. It had better move to more congenial regions, where slavery is considered a Divine institution, and where a man has consideration and political power, just in proportion to the number of niggers he owns.
