Why, the very men who now object on the ground that we have been too severe in our remarks and reports on the management of the campaign, would not unlikely be the first, and herein we should honor them, to call us to account for having failed to lay the whole truth, however unpleasant, however uncomfortable, it might be, before the public, who have such mighty interests at stake in this hour, and who have a right tration on the public confidence. to claim that the press shall do its whole duty, setting forth impartially the whole of political affairs, in connection with the truth, no matter what popular idol may be broken by it.
