What do we now discover? Why, that the the creal crop in Virginia is a total feature—a fact which is pretty broadly binted at if their own papers. My informants assure me, that all slong the road from Richmond to Petersburg they saw lands covered with corn which had hitherto been devoted to tobacco, and that while an ambitious stalk was seen shooting up here and there, the whole presented a puny and sickly appearance that could never come to maturity. This fact alone will prove more allowed the rebels than the less of a disastrous to the rebels than the less of a would for the next six months put on the half of Andrew Jackson's energy, that knowledge alone would be as good as add-ing the three hundred thousand men to the army; it would be such a warning to bad generals and such an encouragement to

What is the Administration thinking What is the Administration thinking good ones as to make victory certain and iron, which have recently been applied with such success in England and Prussia. In so far as reference has been made to England the improvements of most signal importance have been the result of the labors and experiments of Mr. Bessinger. We can all remember what high antisipations both scientific and practical men entertained of the great results Mr. Bessinger was arriving at, when his experiments were first submitted to the public several years ago. But after a season there came a period of silence, and many concluded that after all the apparent promise, nothing had been achieved of any present value in a practical point of view.

That Mr. Bessinger's experiments, though its olderty promise, nothing had been achieved of any present value in a practical point of view.

We had somehow got the impression that the latter was, in point of fact, the true explanation of the recently announced successful results achieved by the new processes commonly known as Bessimer's. In confirmation of this we find in the New York Times, of Monday, as communication from a correspondent, whose attention had
