Nothing emistry, nothing decisive, nothing emphatic and thenchant came from the Cabinet, to guide and harmonize their distracted schemes.

We scarcely blame Mr. Lincoln for this he has had onerous and fearful responsibilities upon him; his advisors have seldom been as one; he was now to his position as the country was; and he needed experience with all the rest of us, in order to see the right way. Ever anxious to do nothing which should not meet the approbation of the people; who so generously, without regard to party feelings came up to his support, he has allowed his caution to subarrass the vigor of his movements. He has, perhaps adopted a wrong theory of the means requeste for the suppression of the rebellion. He has tried to conciliate when he ought to have conquered. But surely, in the light of present events, with the enemy's cannon thundering under his windows, he has been cured of that error. Sirely, he discovers by this time that the war in not to be fought for a compromise but for a victory.
