parison must end. Naporeon, at the close of that eventual and was a state of the stat disastrous day, made haste to enter his carriage—not that in which he came either, for his travelling carriage, with its costly and cumbrous appointments, was not suited for a fugitive, and, besides, it had probably by that time fallen—a prey to the victor—but in such a carriage as could be found, and pressed into his service, he made his way to Paris, and by the 22d had been forced to abdicate the throne of France. A battle, a victory, with such results, necessarily becomes memorable; though in all other respects it may olaim no single attribute that would entitle it to pre-eminence in a company with many a "well-foughten field" of lepser fame—of lesser fame, because their results were less.

While, then, we rejoice in the very moderate amount of victory, which the latest riage not that in which he came either, for their results were less.

While then, we rejoice in the very moderate amount of victory, which the latest dispatches and correspondence from the army show that we are justified in claiming, we cannot forbear wishing—whether self-satisfied generals, and other official notabilities will agree with us or not—that such measures had been taken as would have given us a victory complete and decisive—not merely in the sense of making Maryland and Pennsylvania "safe," but in the true and only sense of such words, when honestly and intelligently used—that is to say, a victory with results commensurate with the means employed, with the greatness and the necessity of the cared, so to be alied to result the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample resources which the nation has supplied, and sharged her sorials, and with the ample re whose reflections on this subject seem to us eminently just:

What we mean, when we say that our success is not equal to our opportunities is this: That the universal expectation of the country was that, with our superior resources, we should either exterminate the rebel army or capture it in its tracks. We have done neither, but we have allowed it be ease, and the fact when made public produced a sensation of intense disappointment. Patriotic hearts were profoundly saddened by the consciousness that the most tremendous battle ever fought on this continent, resembling in its proportions and movements the battle of Waterloo, has not been as declaive in its results. The foe was not out in pieces, but got off by night; he can cross the mountains and effect a wind chetter, or, what seems to us more probable, he can cross the mountains and effect a rapid junction with the armies of Bragg and Kirby Smith. We shall then have ble, he can cross the mountains and effect a rapid junction with the armies of Bragg and Kirby Smith. We shall then have another large, powerful and compensaively affects army of rebellion to encounter and subdue. Had Lee and Jackson been thoroughly conquered, the rebellion would have been cast upon the very jaws of death, but now it has won another lease of life.

This misfortune in the midst of fortune, we owe to two facts—first, the surrender of Harper's Ferry, which the public will never cease to regard as a disgraceful treschory; and second; to the want of energy in the military authorities in calling up reinforcements. There was no reason in the world why such a man as Col. Miles, who had shamefully failed at Bull Run, should have been entrusted with so important a command. In allowing it to be given up he opened the precise loophole which the rebels, in their desporate straita, wanted, and without which they would have been inevitably captured. Again: when Harper's Ferry was known to be gone—and the fact was reported as early as Tuesday nightweet and the succession of the laxity of the Government in not ordering up the trained militia of the northern citles. No less than twenty-four hours after that event, ten or twenty thousand well-armed and disciplined men could have been on their way to take part in a destructive pursuit of the flying foe.

Cheers for Jeff. Davis!

A "Democratic" meeting was held in Temperanceville, on Statuctay evening last, which was addressed by Gro. P. Harntow, the meeting was somewhat enlivened by cheers for Jeff. Davis, which were heartily given, as we are informed. We are sof informed that the traitorous cheers were in any wise rebuked. Those who gave them understand the "Democratic" movement tests to the what it really is—a diversion in favor of Jaff. Davis, and so go straight to the which the cales in the South and South and

What Result?

The late bottle has been characterised by several writers in the newspapers, and possibly even by some of graver authority; as one of Waterloo proportions. Not unjustly either, in certain points of view; for both as regards the numbers engaged, and slao the desperation of valor with which the combatants fought, and the consequent inevitable result, a fearful expenditure of life, the battle of the 17th of September, 1862, may be compared with that of the Shith of June, 1816.

But here, with the mere fighting, all combatants were fighting, all combatants were agently as I can precollect, the words used. Now for the clue: On the morning of the 11th, while taking breakfast, in company with some rebeloficers, I got into an argument with one of them—a Major Yost—in relation to the shilly of the rebels to capture Harper's Ferry. I insisted that one hundred thousand mean could not capture it if properly defended; upon which the Major asked me how many troops I supposed were defendhow many troops I supposed were defending it?
