TUESDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 28.

Hopeful Tokens.

The removal of Buell, and the movement on the Potomac, all betoken a determination on the part of the President to push the war with vigor.

We do not put much reliance upon the reports that the rebel army is falling back from Winchester in the direction of Staunton; but if that is the fact, we may take it as a confession on the part of Gen. Lee that his army is not able to cope with ours. It may, however, be the policy of the rebel commander to draw our army away from the base of its operations and the source of its supplies; but to relinquish the entire valley of the Shenandoah, is a thing Lee would not do if he could avoid it. We do not believe the story all.

Things, upon the whole, look greatly more hopeful than they did a week ago. Then we had reports of the main army going into winter quarters on the north bank of the Potomac; now we may hope that it will push so far South that it need not go into winter quarters at all.

There can be no question that a disposition was felt in some high quarters to keep things in statu quo until "something should turn up"—some arrangement or compromise could be effected; but the late signs indicate that the man whose right it is to rule does not intend to be trifled with any longer. The work, we trust, will now go on; and any man who has no heart for the fight will be very likely to follow Buell into retirement.

It was this hesitating, uncertain policy in the conduct of the war, that gave courage to the disloyal politicians of the North to throw off their masks, and come out boldly with their secession flag, upon which they inscribed that much abused word Democracy. But let a few military heads fall into the basket, and there will be an end to all that sort of thing. Nothing makes people rally around a man so unanimously and enthusiastically as a bold determination to do his duty. But the result of past mistakes will be, on the whole, good: it will enable us to descriminate between the true and false friends of the Union and the Government.

"They Have made a Nation."

So said Mr. GLADSTONE in his speech at Newcastle. We shall let him speak for himself:

"We may have our own opinion about Slavery—we may be for the South, but there is no doubt, I think, about this—Jefferson Davis and the other leaders of the South have made an army—they are making, it appears, a navy—and they have made what is more than either, they have made a nation."

We know to our cost that they "have made an army." As for their navy, that might be disputed; but some of the people of England are trying to make one for them. Their efforts at home in that line have been abortive. But the last achievement which Mr. GLADSTONE gives them credit for is yet of more doubtful success than their navy. That they have organized a military despotism is very true; and that they have had the power to coerce and rob their people is equally true. That their labors have brought desolation and ruin upon the country over which they yet hold sway is a fact patent to all men; and if that be the way to make a nation, they have made one.

Mr. GLADSTONE's remark may be illustrated in this way. A man undertakes to pull down his house that he may build a better on the same spot. He goes to work in the first place to pull down. A confused mass of rubbish is the result. There are some piles of old brick here, and some shattered timber, broken windows and shingeles doors there. A neighbor rides along very coolly and carelessly, and sees him sweating and toiling among the ruins, and then goes off and tells the people at the next village that Mr. Smith or Mr. Davis, as the case may be, has "made a house." Now, that is about the condition of Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS's nation, which Mr. GLADSTONE tells the people of Newcastle is "made." It is only a heap of rubbish. But what is more fatal still, there is an injunction in the hands of a certain ABRAHAM LINCOLN, who has plenary power to estop any further proceedings until the title to the ground on which he is building his nation shall be determined. To make a nation within a nation is not quite so easily done as Mr. DAVIS, or even Mr. GLADSTONE, imagines.

There is another difficulty in the case. Since Mr. DAVIS has torn down his wing of the old house, Mr. LINCOLN has full authority of law to tear up the old foundation and carry away the stones; and as it is impossible for Mr. DAVIS to procure any more, the work of building a new nation on that plan will have to be abandoned. DAVIS will leave.

Morals of the Army.

"There is a too prevalent impression (says the New York Commercial,) that the army is a great school of drunkards; that our volunteer soldiers on their return will be, if not besotted, yet on the high road to ruin by the growth of intemperate habits. So far as the privates are concerned, we believe a greater mistake could scarcely be made. Drunkenness in camp is not only rare, but never noticeable. On the entrance of our troops into any locality a strict order is at once issued, prohibiting the sale of liquor to them under very severe penalties. This order is duly enforced by the provost marshal, who has command of a guard for the special purpose of enforcing the army regulations, and protecting property. A stranger may visit all the hotels within a circuit of fifty miles and be unable, either for love or money, to obtain a glass of liquor stronger than sweet cider. A correspondent who accompanied the army for weeks, visiting probably one hundred different regiments, informs us that he never saw a private soldier who appeared to be under the influence of intoxicating liquors even in the slightest degree. On noticing the circumstance to an officer of strict, temperance principles, the latter replied that if he wanted to reform a man who was in danger of becoming a confirmed drunkard, he would recommend him to enlist. He added that he knew several who had undergone a great reformation in this respect, the desire for ardent spirits having apparently been cured since entering the service."

As a general thing the best men are found in the ranks—men who volunteered from motives of pure patriotism. The same may be said of some officers; but there are many of the latter whom no motives of patriotism could have induced to enter the service as privates. And as regards the morals of the officers not as much can be said favorably as of the men of the ranks. Many of them are intemperate in their habits, and their greater liberty, together with the drinking usages too common in the social life in which they move, expose them to greater temptations. Sometimes, even in battle, officers are too drunk to remain in the saddle.

The health of the army of the Potomac is, on the whole, good; but a more careful attention to personal cleanliness would be a great improvement. The food on which the soldiers are fed is abundant and nutritious; but there is not that variety to which the men had been accustomed at home. Vegetables, fruits, milk and the like are scarce and dear; but are purchased in large quantities when our men have the ready means. It is not in evidence that the ordinary ration has a tendency to promote disorders in the digestive system. The plain English is that a soldier, like a civilian, tires of being fed on the same article every day, especially when these do not comprise the fruits and vegetables to which he had been accustomed. Potatoes, dried apples, onions and other plain articles should be furnished whenever practicable by the government, against which a corresponding deduction might be made from the ordinary ration, which is already superabundant. The coffee which forms the beverage morning, noon and night, though not the best, is superior to what can be obtained in many pretentious Washington hotels, at extravagant prices.

But cleanliness is the grand prerequisite in camp. If ever there is a place where this virtue should rank "next to godliness," it is under the soldiers tent. Let our authorities at Washington and the officers in command see to it that the men wash themselves and change their underclothing daily.

Now, a word upon mental and moral health. Letters from home, kind, full of news, and redolent of home, of mother, sister, sweet-heart, and of dear familiar scenes and faces, are quite as essential to a soldier's moral health. In a lower sense they are what an Apostle calls, in a higher sense, "an anchor to the soul, sure and stedfast." And again, there is no place where Christianity is more needed, and is more beautiful and bright, than in the soldier's camp; and every thing that is calculated to strengthen it where it is, and plant its glorious principles where it is not, ought to be done by the friends of the soldiers at home. We have had many evidences that faith and piety of the highest order exist and flourish among our soldiers.

John Stuart Mill on the American Question.

John Stuart Mill has contributed a valuable article to the Westminster Review, in which he gives the weight of his great authority against the Southern States. He thus pronounces on their designs and the inevitable results of them:

Should these conspirators succeed in making good their independence, and possessing themselves of a part of the territories, being those which are in immediate contact with Mexico, nothing is to be expected but the spread of the institution by conquest over the Spanish America, and if circumstances permit, the conquest and annexation of the West Indies; while on vast an extension of the field for the employment of slaves would raise up a demand for more, which would in all probability lead to that reopening of the African slave trade, the legitimacy and necessity of which have long been publicly asserted by many organs of the South. Such are the issues to humanity which are at stake in the present contest between free and slaveholding America; and such is the cause to which a majority of English writers, and of Englishmen who have the ear of the public, have given the support of their sympathies.

On this point Mr. Mill elaborate, but his proofs of the absence of any claim to our sympathies on the part of the South are well put. In particular he deserves credit for showing that Lord Russell's dictum, that the South are fighting for freedom and the North for dominion, was not only untrue but the very reverse of truth. The practical conclusion to which Mr. Mill comes is the following:

It may, however, prove impossible to reduce the seceded States to unconditional submission without a great lapse of time, and greater sacrifices, than the North may be willing to endure. If so, the terms of compromise suggested by Mr. Cairnes, which would secure all west of the Mississippi for free labor, would be a great immediate gain to the cause of freedom, and would probably in no long period secure its complete triumph. We agree with Mr. Cairnes that this is the only kind of compromise which should be entertained for a moment. That peace should be made giving up the cause of quarrel, the exclusion of slavery from the territories, would be one of the greatest calamities which could happen to civilization and to mankind. Close the territories, prevent the spread of the disease to countries not now afflicted with it, and much will already have been done to hasten its doom. But that doom would still be distant if the vast colonized region of Arkansas and Texas, which alone is thought sufficient to form five States, were left to be filled up by a population of slaves and their masters; and no treaty of seperation can be regarded as anything satisfaction but one which should convert the whole country west of the Mississippi into a free soil.

The poet Whittier, in a published letter, puts his support of Mr. Sumner on the following grounds:

"I freely admit that, in times like these, no man has a claim to office on merely personal or party grounds. But there are men who specially represent and embody vital ideas of loyalty and freedom, and such it is the duty of patriotism to support. I favor the re-election of Charles Sumner in Massachusetts for the same reasons that I would vote for the conservative Governor Sprague of Rhode Island—for the Breckinridge Democrat, Daniel S. Dickinson, of New York—for such Douglas Democrats as Gov. Tod, of Ohio, and McClernand, of Illinois—or for O. A. Brownson, the Catholic Democrat of New Jersey—careless of what their party names may be, so long as I know them to be loyal and true, and their services are needed in this hour of the country's peril."

There is on exhibition in Paris an instrument which imitates the human voice so as to be mistaken for it. It represents a female seated; and the larynx is constructed on physiological principles of construction. The voice has the compass of two octaves, and sings any air with the tone of the female voice.

A Miraculous Escape.—A little boy fell down a coal shaft in Mascoutah, Illinois, a distance of 158 feet, and escaped with no

Proposed Solution of the Roman Question.

The Independance of Brussels has the following rumor, in which there may be some truth:

"We are assured that immediately on the return of the Emperor to St. Cloud, important steps will be taken for the settlement of the Roman question; and if we may credit the information of our correspondent, the object of the Italian government to obtain the assent of the Italian government to the project submitted to Cardinal Antonelli by M. de Lavalette, without the guaranty offered to the Pope for the possession of his actual territory. The cabinet of Turin should engage not to invade the pontifical States or permit the invasion of them by volunteers from any part of Italy; upon which France would recall her troops and leave the temporal power to its own resources. If, however, after the withdrawal of the French troops, the inhabitants of the Papal States, restored to entire freedom of action, should decide upon separating from a government to which the strength and will of France alone has subjected them; if, disposing of themselves, they should manifest their strong determination to be united to the rest of Italy, the imperial government would offer no obstacle to the fulfilment of such a desire, and Victor Emmanuel would be at liberty to accept from the hands of the Romans that capital which France has not the wish or the power to give him. This arrangement would be perfectly acceptable to Italy, for it would open out the only way to the accomplishment of her aspirations; and we cannot see what serious objections it could meet with at Turin."

Our Guardian Bird in Battle.—In a letter, dated at Corinth, October 12th, written by Chester D. Howe, of Co. E, 12th Illinois volunteers, is the following. Speaking of the recent fight at Corinth, he says:

* * * The finest thing I ever saw was a live American eagle, carried by the 8th Iowa, in the place of a flag. It would fly off over the enemy during the hottest of the fight, then would return and seat himself upon his pole, clap his pinions, shake his head, and start again. Many and hearty were the cheers that arose from our lines as the old fellow would sail around, first to the right and then to the left, and always return to his post, regardless of the storm of laden hail that was flying around him. Something seemed to tell us that that battle was to result in our favor, and when the order was given to charge, every man went at them with fixed bayonets, and the enemy scattered in all directions, leaving us in possession of the battle-field.

A Wonderful Document.—Judging from the tone of the Democratic press, the President's emancipation proclamation is a marvelous document. A perusal of the New York Herald, Express, Journal of Commerce, Chicago Times, Cincinnati Enquirer and others of that stripe, enable the reader to discover the following peculiarities of the proclamation:

It will destroy the Union.
It is harmless and impotent.
It will excite slave insurrections.
The slaves will never hear of it.
It will excite the South to desperation.
The rebels will laugh it to scorn.

These are a few of the attributes which the Democratic presses give to the instrument.
