

To Our Advertising Patrons.

The undersigned publishers of the city daily press have been compelled, by the depression of the currency, the operation of the new tax bill, and the greatly increased cost of everything used in the printing art, to take counsel together, so as to protect themselves from loss, at the smallest expense to their patrons...

But even this is not all. Owing to the prevalent practice of each manufacturer, or proprietor of taxable articles, making himself singly the agent for collecting the Government tax from the consumer, the import and export duties are thrown upon the publisher, and upon every article employed in making up a paper...

Winter Plans for the Army.

A gentleman of large military experience makes the following reply to some remarks of the New York Times upon the advance of the Army of the Potomac into Virginia.

New York, Thursday, Nov. 9, 1862. Dear Sir:—This is no time to lead either ourselves or the public, you must attribute it to my zeal for the public good, if I speak out at once. I differ with you entirely in your opinion in reference to "The Advance of Our Army," as being actually intended on "crushing out the rebellion."

Since the 20th of October, the left wing of McClellan's army, under Burdick, has been creating slowly along the first range of the Alleghenies (Blue Ridge) southward toward Anby's Gap, where the right wing of the army has taken strong position in considerable force.

But it took fully eight days before Burdick's army advanced. This advance only 20 or 30 miles, which is not the result of any great exertion, but of a steady and unobtrusive movement.

THEIR APPREHENSIONS? Not very much.

It would be a very pleasant assurance in a quiet way, when all was going on well; but it is a comfort that they are not apprehensive of other qualities. It is a matter of course.

Is he firm? Do his subordinates any longer put under such circumstances, leaving the matter of money to be "discussed" at a more convenient season? We have some times thought it strange, that the ancients should have clung to the ancients, when the highest virtues, if not the very highest, had fallen upon them.

The Republican, in making choice of ANANIAS LINCOLN as their candidate, did well; for they chose an honest man, and one who would have made a chief magistrate of the highest order in ordinary times.

But it took fully eight days before Burdick's army advanced. This advance only 20 or 30 miles, which is not the result of any great exertion, but of a steady and unobtrusive movement.
