will draw to itself more and more remmerating business than could be galaed by the two act-ing independently and in competition. As the through business will no longer be sought after to the detriment of local business (as this will follow its natural channels), each company will be better able to develop the local business which properly belongs to it. It is reasonable to believe that a very con-siderable reduction in expenses may be effected by the discontinuance of ageneiss of various kinds, which a vigorous competition between two rival companies is sure to re-various allow, which companies is sure to re-quire; and in short, that a larger business can be done more cheaply by the combined roads than under the old system of independ-
