In 1797 the English were driven from the Island by Touissaint, after which, from the Island by Touissaint, after which, under the energetic administration of that extraordinary man, the colony flourished, commerce revived, the whites were restored to the possession of their estates, and whites and blacks placed on political equality. General Jaokson, in a moment of great public danger, did not stand cowering be-fore a vulgar prejudice. There was no timid balancing of duty against expediency with him. His country needed MEN, and Jaokson eard not a straw for their color. Whatever may have been his opinion of the social equality or inequality of colored men, he had the good sense to know, and to act upon the knowledge, that a black the social equality or inequality or colored men, he had the good sense to know, and to sot upon the knowledge, that a black man could aboot a red-coat or stop a bullet as well as a white man. Any number of them than white men. Any number of them [Laughter.] than white men. Any number of them may be had without a resort to proscrip-tion; and the very fact that they are por-mitted to bear a part in the war as organ-ired troops will put an end to all danger of servile insurrection, and bring peaceably about that great social revolution which is now invertable in the South; and—con-trary to all the preconceived notions of mankind with regard to the slaves of this conntrr---it may yet prove true of them as
