From Burnside's Army.

From the army correspondence of the New York Tribune we take the following interesting regarding the late movements and preparations for movements—in that army:

Camp Grave Division, Jan. 20, 1863.

Two days ago, throughout the entire army, there were the most unmistakable signs of an immediate intended active movement against the enemy. The advance had been commenced and the pontoon train had started for its destination. The preliminary orders had all been issued; the surgeons had been thronged by the sick ones, suddenly assailed by calmness and indescribable diseases, while others were animated with the most unbounding impatience for battle. Since then the movement has been twice postponed for twenty-four hours, and there is now a rise upon that it may be still further delayed—perhaps indefinitely. Our own opinion is that the severely cold weather, which set in on the night of the 19th, and the movement was to commence, has occasioned the delay. A slight wound received days as we have just seen, would seriously endanger life, an mercy to the army demands that a battle should not be offered at present.

It may be that the enemy, who have exhibited to much knowledge of our plans in progress, have shown by counter movements that our plans would probably have proved unsuccessful. There is probably no point available for a crossing, at which the enemy have not constructed rifle pits, or fortified block houses. Several who were yesterday reconnoitering the course of the river, decided they had discovered a quiet spot, suitable for the bridges, which they at once set to work upon, the enemy leaving their houses unmanned. So they dropped down to the bottom lands through which the river coursed, and were making the secluded locality, were unable to discover any signs of rifle pits or fortifications. They, however, several gray backs perceived, who were behind a grass grown embankment, which proved to have two pieces of artillery, and a large number of the crossing. We may look for a warm reception from the sharpshooters whenever and wherever the operations of the bridge builders are commenced.

THE MORALE OF THE ARMY.

There has been much given to the public of late calculated to diminish the good opinion in which the Army of the Potomac has previously been held. Those who have been recently exaggerating the dissensions and discouragement of the soldiers, will satisfy evidity upon the fact of the recent mutiny of a German battery, to confirm their high-colored reports. Such stories do great injustice to the army and injury to the service. Nothing like what they have represented is really the facts. It is true that a prolonged period of inactivity, during which the men have been unpaid, and unable to purchase anything for themselves or send money to their families, has considerably damped the ardor and enthusiasm of many, yet nothing like disloyalty or insubordination can with any truth be said to pervade the army.

Not very long for a person who soldiers since of Harrison and First street, will receive prompt attention.

attack the enemy in the rear of their fortifications at Fredericksburg.

The movement which is now in progress was ordered to commence on Sunday morning. It was postponed for some reason until Monday. On Monday it was again postponed until Tuesday, when at 9 o'clock a. m. Gen. Franklin's Grand Division, the Sixth Army Corps (General Smith) in the advance, commenced moving from their position, five miles below Falmouth, toward General Burnside's headquarters. Hooker's Center Grand Division commenced its march at 11 o'clock a. m., and being nearer the destination of its movement, preceded Franklin toward Banks Ford. To make the advance those roads were used which were sufficiently back from the river to prevent the enemy from observing it. The Warrenton turnpike was accordingly reached not by the direct route through Falmouth, but by way of Stoneman's Station and roads which had been prepared by the gentlemen and difficult labor of the Pioneer Corps.

THE PREPARATIONS.

The preparations for the movement, have been most careful and thorough. Roads have been built to a dozen places upon the river, that the enemy threatened at various points might thereby be left in perplexity in regard to our intentions, and that a favorable diversion in any direction might be immediately turned to advantage by crossing rapidly at any point distant from where the enemy had concentrated. Every point of the river has been carefully examined and the possibility of protecting a crossing with the artillery been fully studied. The fullest military maps have been furnished and for days have been studied and made familiar with the numerous roads and by ways necessary for the rapid concentration of the army.

PLAN OF ATTACK.

These preparations hint at the plan of Gen. Burnside. Threatening the enemy by military roads leading to the Rappahannock immediately below Falmouth. At the same time below are many fords
