THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

The Movement Stopped by the Storm.

The Army correspondence of the Eastern papers gives the following details of the late attempted crossing of the Rappahannock. The movement seems to have been well-planned, and would probably have been successful, accomplishing the grand object of General Burnside, to cross the river at an advantageous and almost undefended point, by which he would have outflanked the enemy's position, but that again there was disappointment about the pontoon trains, though in this case, probably, the delay was excusable, owing to the unexpected condition of the roads, which a sudden storm had rendered almost impassible.

The New York Tribune correspondent writes thus on Thursday:

BANKS FORD OF RAPPAHANNOCK,
Six miles above Fredericksburg, Jan. 22.

The river here is about a hundred yards wide. Hooker's bridges are to be thrown over above the ford, and Franklin's below. It was the original intention to cross yesterday morning at daybreak; but the pontoons did not arrive in season; in fact they had not all come up yesterday at midnight. The rain, which began at 7 o'clock Tuesday night, has, of course, greatly delayed them; and the artillery which preceded them, (as I think they would not have arrived in time if the weather continued favorable. There seems to be an incapacity for promptness in the Engineer corps. The weather had been favorable, ever since the battle of Fredericksburg, until a few hours after this movement began.

Had we been ready to cross at the appointed time, the enemy could not have offered serious resistance. He is now concentrating heavily on our front. We are hopeful rather than confident.

A more particular description of the locality at which the movement is at present threatening will enable the reader to understand better the present situation.

Our crown artillery is reported upon a high plateau, 150 feet above the river which runs beneath it. The bank of the river is high and steep.

A ravine formed by a brook runs down to the river, and through this and by the road has been built intended for the passage of the troops and artillery. The pontoons are to be carried to the edge of the bank, and slid down to help them forward; and I fancied that the whole men, wagons, guns, mules, soldiers and all, was gradually disappearing from sight in the mud.

As I picked my way along, I saw a horseman covered with mud from cap to stirrup, whom I took to be an orderly, and a very filthy one at that. He was ordering a teamster to unhitch his mules and take them to the front, to help another team out which barred the way. I sat and watched the operation for a while, and listened to the orders, which began to bring a little hope of extrication to this benighted train. Presently I got a glimpse of the supposed orderly's face, and saw that it was no less a person than Gen. Hooker. He was dressed in a black, water-proof coat, and was plastered with the ochrous mud, so that he was scarcely recognizable. His presence and vigorous orders set matters going again, and while he remained there the sea of mud began to wriggle and move, reminding one of the general movement on a plate of molasses covered with flies, when, by reason of some general alarm, the flies make a tumultuous struggle to get away.

Slocum, Stoneman, Griffin, Sykes, Humphreys, Franklin, Burnside, were all in front, all doing their best to get the wagons through, and all covered with mud. All day long it was one continued and exhausting struggle with the mud—an enemy worse than the rebels. Wednesday night the tired troops lay down in their blankets.

It rained all night. Next morning (Thursday,) it was determined to concentrate the pontoons at Banks' Ford. Near this ford the river banks are high, and form a table land or ridge, up to which the guns and pontoons were dragged, all next day, by the united labor of men and horses. There the ground was somewhat more firm.

But it was now seen that the approaches cut to the river were impracticable. The mud in these freshly cut roads was too deep. The fords were not attainable. The river was not much swollen; but horses, wagons and guns could not be taken down to the water.

However, the roads were pretty well cleared of wagons and other impediments on Thursday, everything dragged up to the higher ground, and on that night the men camped in the woods near by, and all around. Here the sturdy woodsmen went in with their axes, and generally made a clearing; their huge fires began to shine out, and something like comfort began to prevail in this ocean of mud. Rebel camp fires were visible during the night on the other side of the river.

The work of moving the pontoons had been stopped, and they rested on a high bluff a hundred rods back from the river. Thursday it began to be rumored that we were to return and give up the attempt. On that night Generals Burnside and Hooker returned, and the cavalry and light artillery was ordered back.

This (Friday) morning Gen. Sumner's grand division, which had been holding itself ready to march during the whole time, received orders to unpack and again encamp. They had not left their camp grounds, but still remained in front of Fredericksburg.

THE RETURN TO CAMP.

This morning the stragglers are gathering up all the stray batteries, and wagons are filing in, while brigade after brigade is preparing for the return. As I quit camp all is busy. Before this will be published the major portion of the army will again be in camp before Fredericksburg.

An Important Letter from Major-General Hitchcock—General McClellan's Disobedience of Presidential Orders.

The following important letter, addressed by Major General Hitchcock, Advising General of the War Department, to the Washington Chronicle, will be read with interest, as an authoritative statement of General McClellan's responsibility for disobedience of orders. Truly, as General Hitchcock remarks, while "brilliant success has often protected an officer from the penalty affixed by law to disobedience of orders, it will be a new feature in military history when failure, resulting from a departure from plans and orders, shall be visited upon the superior, whose plan was not followed and whose orders were neglected." And yet this is just what "Little Mac and his pack" have been endeavoring to do for months past; but the recent developments have pretty well blocked that game. General Hitchcock's letter itself is, indeed, but an excerpt of the testimony brought out in these investigations:

"To the Editor of the Daily Chronicle:

"Sir: The New York Times of yesterday contains what was designed to be received by the public as a report of my testimony before the McDowell Court, now in session in this city; but it is so full of errors and inaccuracies of all sorts, misplacements of whole passages, and in one material particular directly reversing my statement, that I beg to request that you will afford space in your columns for the accurate publication of that testimony, together with the documents exhibited with it, which can doubtless be had at the court-room.

"If my testimony was worth publishing at all, it ought to have been published as I gave it. It was the duty of the Court to determine the questions I should be called upon to answer, and mine only to state the truth, as sworn to. The Court asked my opinion touching the responsibilities in case of a disobedience of orders by General McClellan, in not leaving for the security of Washington the force designated by the four commanders of the four army corps composing the Army of the Potomac.

"In answering this question I placed the responsibility where military law and army usage has always placed it—with the officer who, as was assumed in the question, had disobeyed the order—to wit, with General McClellan, and not with the President, who, in taking good his original order, by the detention of a part of McDowell's corps in front of Washington, merely took a necessary step to repair a mischief committed by General McClellan himself, in not attending to the order of the 8th of March, which was reiterated through the Secretary of War on the 13th of the same month.

"In the Times' report of my testimony this portion of it is inverted, and I am put forward as bound to suppose by accident as placing the responsibility with the President and not with Gen. McClellan.

"My opinion was, and was so stated to the Court, that General McClellan, in disobeying the orders of the President, took upon himself the responsibility for all the consequences that might follow such disobedience. This is a plain military principle, which every soldier understands.

"I will add here that General McClellan's proper course, under the orders of the President, was first to obey the orders punctually and precisely, and then to consider whether he had sufficient force left for the execution of his plan of going to Richmond via Yorktown and the Peninsula. If not he should have reported to the President before starting on his expedition. If, in that case, the President had required him to proceed in the execution of his plans, all the world would have placed the responsibility at the door of the President. Gen. McClellan did not do this.

"He commenced his expedition 'neglecting' the point so 'explicitly' ordered by the President, and put a large part of his force in motion for the Fatherns before the President knew of that 'neglect,' and thus took upon himself the entire responsibility for all that followed.

"A brilliant success has often protected an officer from the penalty affixed by law—see the ninth Article of War—to disobedience of orders; but it will be a new feature in military history when failure, resulting from a departure of plans and orders, shall be visited upon the superior, whose plan was not followed, and whose orders were 'neglected.'

"Respectfully, &c.,
"H. A. HITCHCOCK.
"WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., Jan. 21, 1863."

Vicksburg.

The New York Commercial remarks that Gen. Grant is not accompanied by gunboats, and that the attack upon Vicksburg will, on his part, be purely military, but that it will, probably be so timed as to co-operate with Gen. Banks' column, and Admiral Farragut's fleet from below. In fact, gunboats cannot operate to much advantage with their heads down the stream. The New York Herald has a report that the Mississippi has risen so much as to cause the water to flow through the canal which was cut across the peninsula last summer opposite Vicksburg. If this be true, (although we think it a little premature,) a new channel will soon be cut, and the upper fleet can get down below without having to run the gauntlet of the Vicksburg forts, turn about, and fight with their prows up stream. In fact that new cut would render Vicksburg worthless and unavailing as a rebel stronghold.
