FROM KENTUCKY

Special Dispatch to the Pittsburgh Gazette

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF GENERAL E. V. LEXINGTON, May 23, 1862

I have just returned from an extended tour to the several camps on the Cumberland. The reports of large rebel forces in East Tennessee have been much exaggerated, and are mostly derived from rebel sources. Their principal numbers are collected in Wayne county, Ky., under Morgan and Wheeler. The report of reinforcements to Beckner, from Virginia, is not reliable.

Gen. Callaway, with a detachment of the 44th, who crossed the Cumberland foot on a reconnaissance to the Gap, has returned. He advanced to the Gap, captured all their pickets, and inaugurated a plan against the rebels who fed in confidence. Not having a sufficient force to venture taking the fortifications, he fell back, whereupon the rebels pursued and attacked him. Facing about, he again retreated, and safely recovered the river. It was a brilliant success for the 44th, who captured some fifteen rifles, and a large number of cartridges.

These comprise all the military items to date. There are no rebels north of the Cumberland river. The weather is fine and the soldiers in the health and spirits, which came up the attention of the commandant. General Wilcox is carrying out order No. 38 with a vigor pleasing to Union men and the reverse to the rebels. Some job Vicksburg have been notified to join Vicksburg. The roads are everywhere thronged with fugitives and Southern Kentucky families. The burning of houses yesterday had like to have been more serious than the mere loss of property. One hundred and thirty-four were in it, and were saved only by the most prompt and energetic action. Gen. Wilcox understands the situation of all the rebels in the hands of honest citizens. He made a narrow escape from being crushed by the fall of an iron bridge from an upper story of a building. The bridge was over the river, and the rebels were on the other side. The building cost $20,000, and is a total loss.
