Appletons, and forming a companion-volume to the present,) and had occasion then to remark that Mr. Huxley adopts the views of Mr. Darwin and maintains the 'development theory,' so eloquentity set forth in that eminent naturalist's work on the same subject. Those who have read the former work of Mr. Huxley, will probably feel irresistibly drawn onward to follow up the onsideration of the question there opened, by whatever facts and arguments the present volume can supply. For our own part, while we frestly admit that many of these are both ingenious and plausible, and many of those exceedingly interesting, we are as far from finding in nature evidence of this development-power, accounting for the diversities of the specific forms of plants and animals, as we could be, if, instead of reading Mr. Huxley, we wore again reading Ovid's 'Metamorphoses,' or Lucretius 'De Rerum Natura.'
