inference from the terms of the Constitution. Even without an express constitutional grant of power, we have no doubt that the chief executive magistrate of any state, who is sworn to maintain and preserve the laws, has a perfect right for resort to extraordinary, and what would otherwise be illegal measures, to save the government from overthrow and the nation from ruin. The law of self-preservation is implied in all other laws, as indeed the ground and bulwark of all other laws, as every written, and justified by every publicist who has ever written, and justified by every publicist who has every written, and justified by the common sense of every people.

We copy a few paragraphs:

As to the letter itself, it is creditable to the President in avery way—in manner as well as matter—and it can only have a good sifect upon the popular sentiment. It must be not the popular sentiment, it must be not be entire sincerity, and honesty place, of the entire sincerity, and honesty wither precesses of law, in a time of invasion and divit was, and when the public safety and divities it, is a matter of almost inevitable requires it, is a matter of almost inevitable requires it, is a matter of almost inevitable. 15 PIPTE STREET.
