State Rights and State Defence.

We note among the new dodges of the copperhead Democracy a recurrence to the doctrine of State Rights, which had been made so odious by its recent fruits as to render it a somewhat delicate operation to handle it as heretofore. It is suggested, no doubt at the present time, by the failure of the General Government to render that protection to the State which is always supposed to be the consideration of allegiance, and in our case is pledged by the instrument which vests in that government the exclusive control of our armies, as well as by its renewed call upon the inhabitants to defend themselves. People will naturally look to that quarter to which they find the authorities at Washington turning themselves in their extremity so often for relief. We are not surprised, therefore, to find the sympathizers with the rebellion taking advantage of the circumstance, to prepare the way for the establishment here of the idea that we are but a Federal league and not a nation, and that of course the secession of the Cotton States was well warranted, and may be legitimately followed by the withdrawal or revolt of our own. If they shall succeed, with the aid of the authorities at Washington, in indoctrinating the people with this heretical and mischievous notions, the rebellion is not only justified, but the government of the Union is at an end. We would not give the toss of a copper for such a combination of jarring and discordant elements as a confederacy of these states, or any considerable number of them, would make with the privilege to all of them of withdrawing upon the slightest provocation, or without any provocation at all, and setting up for themselves. We should be the prey of the powerful, and the contempt of the world, with nothing but anarchy and bloodshed for our portion. God save us from such an infliction.

It is a curious fact, however, that at the very outbreak of this rebellion, and even while the present Executive of this State was conferring with the conservative Republicans, and co-operating with the equally conservative Democrats upon the efficacy of humble pie, and the danger of provoking hostility on the part of the Border States by putting our own Commonwealth in a state of defence, the whole influence of his position was exerted to bring about a Congress of Ambassadors of pretended sovereignties under the very nose of the General Government, and in clear violation of the very spirit and letter of the Constitution of the United States. To effect this, either for the sake of the miserable patronage which it conferred, or because he really thought that the Union was to be patched up by this kind of statesmanship, he spared no pains to win over the leading men of both parties to the recognition of the pestilent heresy which was just then threatening the existence of this nation, by accepting the invitation of that old incorrigible culprit Virginia, to meet with her and other States, in contempt of the authority of the Union, for the purpose of resettling the Government, and deciding upon what terms the offended sovereigns would consent to submit to the vote of the people as expressed in the election of LINCOLN. The panacea failed, although a majority of the Governors' delegates were found voting throughout with the Ambassadors of the Southern principalities, and Pennsylvania remained unorganized and unarmed, to reap at this day the fruits of the wisdom that feared offence even in the exercise of a provident regard for the safety of her own citizens.

And this reminds us of another piece of statesmanship of the same kind, which looked for the cure of our national evils in further voluntary prostrations and self-abasement on the part of the Northern States. Wise men, like WOODWARD, were of the opinion that Pennsylvania could save the Union, not by arming—for that would have been as offensive to Southern pride as the parade of Sherman's Battery in the avenue—but by repealing a harmless section of our penal code on the subject of kidnapping, which was only an affirmance of the common law, and of which nobody had ever complained.—Conservative statesmen—Heaven save the mark!—even of Republican professions, were equally agreed upon the all-healing efficacy of a gentle emetic which should unload our statute-book of this supposed cause of offense, and the newly-elected Governor, who had called in a conservative doctor to revise and flatten down his inaugural, was not behind the rest in the opinion that meekness and milk-and-water, submission and slops, were the sovereign remedy for the disease of a State, which was then throbbing with the agonies of an incipient revolution whose causes and elements were fermenting away down among the foundation-stones on which it rested, and far below the visual reach of the surface-explorers—the mere political rag-pickers—who believe in court-plasters and cataplasms. The heresy, however, which was involved in this potent nostrum, was of the same class precisely as the former, because it looked to State action—of a very ridiculous character, to be sure—for the correction of a supposed evil, which grew, if it existed at all, out of our Federal relations exclusively, and was only remediable at the hands of the General Government, through its Legislature or its Judiciary.

Upon the other question, however, of arming the State for the emergency, which was so tenderly eschewed, there was a peculiar fitness for intervention, because, the organization and control of the militia, in the normal condition of actual peace, belong to the States alone, and yet it was precisely here that the authorities failed in providing for the occasion in the only way in which they could have legitimately and effectively intervened. That, however, which is now admitted to have been a capital error, and is appropriately set down by some of the Philadelphia newspapers to the account of the Legislature, as a grave and palpable neglect of a high public duty, was not the fault of the Republicans proper, or Radicals, as they were called, who represented the great Western and Northern counties of this State. When one of our own members, who urged this point again and again, exclaimed in his place that "The way to save the effusion of blood was to show that we were ready to shed it, if necessary, in such a cause"—that "every drop that should actually flow in the contest would be on the heads and consciences of the timid counsellors, who whispered peace and advised concession," and that "instead of talking of concessions, the cry 'to arms,' should ring out from the State capital, through every valley, and along every mountain top in Pennsylvania," or "the programme of the traitors would be extended from Washington to Philadelphia and Harrisburg"—he was denounced by the Philadelphia press, and regarded by the Governor himself as a bloody-minded visionary and little better than an incendiary while Philadelphia Democrats and Peoples' men were alike condemning his ultraism and relying on the repeal of the 95th section—the Peace Convention of State sovereigns, and the compromises of the fossil statesmen of the Crittenden school, as an easy and efficient substitute for men, and muskets, and big-throated metallic persuaders, with trumpets and with drums. While we admit, therefore, the soundness of the complaint, though somewhat tardy in the utterance, we take satisfaction here in being able to reply, "thou canst not say we did it."

What we now aim at in these remarks is not, however, any idle crimination, but the practical fruits of the lessons which these things teach us. One of the greatest of them is to put no further trust in those whose timidity and want of statesmanship have once already betrayed us into blunders that have proved so fatal. How different would have been the tone of public sentiment among the unhappy fugitives of the Cumberland Valley, with a ruler here of tried courage, and wisdom, and integrity, who could have inspired the people with a just confidence, and breathed into their hearts a little of that ancient spirit which flamed out in deadly volleys from every bush and fence, as the yeomanry of New England, with their own trusty rifles, rolled back the tide of mercenary invasion from the commons of Lexington and the streets of Concord, instead of showing them the aspect of white lips and chattering teeth, and a dismantled capitol, denuded even of its Revolutionary relics, its high dignitaries in travelling dresses, with horses ready bridled at the gate, and a half-uttered "Sauve qui peut" just trembling upon their coward tongues? Shades of Mifflin and McKean, how felt you (if shades can feel) when your portraits were taken down from the walls, and hurried to places of security which you would have scorned to seek yourselves?

Lee's Army—Its Numbers—Its Chances of Escape.

Contrary to the general tendency of correspondents writing about the numbers of the rebel army, here is one who wrote the other day the following very moderate estimate:

From persons who had counted them, and in whose judgment I had great confidence, I learned that the whole force that had passed through Greencastle and Chambersburg, including teamsters and officers, infantry, cavalry and artillery, did not exceed thirty-four thousand. That about two thousand still lay outside Greencastle that had not been counted, making in all thirty-six thousand men. This, with the force under Early at York, would make the whole rebel force north of Hagerstown not more than forty-thousand five hundred. Accompanying this army were one hundred and sixty-two pieces of artillery, forty of which were the heaviest kind of Parrott guns, sixty of which were heavy brass cannon, and the rest consisting of Napoleons, for throwing shell, and a thin mounted rifled cannon, which I had never seen before. These, with cannon with Early's force, make the rebel artillery amount to one hundred and eighty-four pieces. The whole force of cavalry and mounted infantry did not exceed 1,600. Only about one-third of these were regular cavalrymen, armed with carbines, sabres and revolvers. The remainder were armed with sabres and Enfield rifles, without bayonets.

I learned that Gen. Ewell, with his whole force, except that portion which was under Early at York, occupied the extreme front; that Longstreet and D. H. Hill were within supporting distance of Ewell up near Shippensburg and Carlisle. General A. P. Hill's corps amounts to about sixteen thousand. This would leave a force of eighteen to twenty thousand in the Cumberland valley, Chambersburg to Harrisburg, at the present writing.

During the progress of Lee's late movement from the South side of the Rappahannock to the Shenandoah Valley, and thence Northwards into Maryland and Pennsylvania, we read from day to day, in the newspapers, the usual exaggerated statements, or estimates, of the number of his forces, which were represented to amount to a round 100,000 at least, but more generally the figures were carried up to 125,000. While we read, of course we felt that those exaggerations were designed by the rebels to subserve some good purpose in carrying out their plan of invasion; —just as they had made Manassas unapproachable eighteen months ago by fictitious accounts of the hosts encamped there, and by the high-frowning batteries of wooden guns, which had a most formidable appearance from a distance;—just as at Yorktown, and on the approach to Richmond, they had succeeded everywhere in magnifying their numbers, their works, everything that was theirs, in the eyes of the same general whom they had so long held at bay at Manassas;—just as at Chancellorsville, where they had but 49,700 men, by a similar game of exaggeration, they made another general, never before remarkable for excess of caution, retreat from a strong position with an army outnumbering them nearly two to one.

With such lights in the past, we can hardly err in interpreting the meaning of the army of 100,000, or 125,000, reported under the command of LEE, as another game—a repetition, rather, of the same game—of "escare," which has been such a winning one in their hands, since the very beginning of the war. Inasmuch, then, as we find that LEE promptly called in all his scattered bodies of troops from every quarter, Carlisle, York, etc., as soon as he saw that he must fight MEADE; and inasmuch as he made the same disposition of his forces in the late battles as in all his previous ones, massing his troops into columns and directing his attack entirely on one point, we may fairly conclude that all the circumstances of the situation and the requirements of the day were pretty much the same also, and especially that he had no such numbers as 100,000 or 125,000 men to lead into battle; else we should certainly have had a very different development both of strategy as respects the campaign, and of tactics as respects the late battle, from a general so universally credited with great, if not consummate, ability to use his resources, as LEE. On the whole, therefore, we derive encouragement to believe that our preponderance in numbers is so great that, with well-directed efforts and co-operation of our forces under MEADE, COUCH, FRENCH and PLEASANTON, the capture or destruction of the whole rebel army may be possible—and that the temerity of the slave-holding invader will thus be punished, and the stigma itself, of having suffered the invasion of its soil, be effectually wiped out by the armies of the free North.

THE Detroit ladies put their old crinoline to good use. They suspend them by a pole running through the center, thus forming a circular trellis, around which cypress-vines and morning glories cluster in the wildest luxuriance.

A NEW YORK letter-writer, who is well advised, states that Mrs. Tom Thumb is in excellent health, and would be the subject of daily bulletins were she the Empress Eugenie.

MEMPHIS ST. LOUIS, MO. OLAY.

Having accepted the Agency for the sale of the MEMPHIS OLAY, situated near St. Louis, Mo., I invite the attention of Glass and Steel Manufacturers to the Analysis given above as reported by Profs. A. A. Hayes, Boston, and J. C. Booth, of Philadelphia, which, together with the test of actual experience by manufacturers in Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and St. Louis, determines it to be the purest and most available Clay now known, whether Foreign or American. Pots made from it have stood in the Glass Furnace from 6½ to 9 months.

The Analysis is of the Clay as taken from the mine, without any washing or preparation whatever. Its freeness from adhesiveness and plasticity qualities, which are not shown by the Analysis, and which admit of the admixture of a large proportion of sand or fire clay.

I am now prepared to fill orders for the above Clay, to be shipped from St. Louis or delivered here.
