MORNING AND EVENING EDITIONS, DAILY, CONTAINING THE LATEST NEWS UP TO THE HOUR OF PUBLICATION.

SATURDAY MORNING, JULY 25.

The New York Newspapers, and the Rioters.

"Agate," of the Cincinnati Gazette, who was in New York, during the late riots, gives the following account of the Tribune and Times, preparing to give the rioters a fitting reception:

The newspaper offices were (it me, of course, a focus of special interest. The Herald, and World, and News were safe—the Mob had the grace at least to know its friends. But the Times and Evening Post, and especially the Tribune, had been in imminent danger, and it was by no means certain that the danger was yet past. The Tribune Counting Room still bore evidences of the Mob's rough entrance, but the damage really done was trifling. It was said the leaders complained that the Tribune had been attacked too soon, and before their preparations were complete for making sure work of it.

At any rate they had insured the failure of any subsequent attempt. Mr. Greeley, Mr. Gunnison and others had originally opposed arming the office, as a matter of policy; but after the first futile attempt of the mob, they speedily turned the establishment into an arsenal. Muskets were procured for every employee. The floors of the editorial rooms were littered with hand grenades, and extra bayonets were lying about on the desks like some new pattern of mammoth penholders. Arrangements for throwing hot water and for pouring a volume of scalding steam into the lungs of anybody attempting to force an entrance, had been perfected.

In the midst of all the warlike preparations, Mr. Greeley, coat off and apparently just risen from preparing a leader, was listening to the statements of his reporters as to the progress of the mob, and making suggestions for perfecting the defenses of the office, with an air that smacked far less of non-resistance than it had. Across the street, in the Times office, the preparations for resisting an attack were not so elaborate, but nevertheless they were quite ample.

Gross injustice was done Mr. Greeley, not only by the portion of the New York press in sympathy with the mob, but also by others who ought to have known better, by statements of his conduct and counsels during the emergency. The Tribune, I take it, is the best exponent of Mr. Greeley's policy; and surely no one can complain that its tone was truculent or submissive. But aside from this, every one at all conversant with the facts, knows that Mr. Greeley's conduct was precisely what it should have been. He was at his place, in his office and conforming to his usual habits of work. For the rest, the Tribune, after the evening its counting room war broke into, was very emphatically on a war footing.

There were still more expectations of an attack on the Republican newspaper offices last night, based upon threats and misgivings of leaders of the mob; and so I went around to Printing House Square again about ten o'clock. A glanced showed that the mob that should attempt anything there would be more than usually fool-hardy. In front of the City Hall was a battery of artillery, and a couple of regiments were in the immediate vicinity, while the police were also out in strong force.

The Times was not disposed to hide its light under a bushel, mob or no mob. Partly with the design of saying to the mob: "Here we are, gentlemen; this is the New York Times office, if you want to try mobbing it;" and partly with a view of lighting up the square, so that the movements of the rioters could be distinctly seen, if they should come down, both points of the building were illuminated; scores of gas-jets on either one formed a blazing "N. Y. Times" sign, and one side they had a huge eagle of gas-jets, with a blazing "Union" across its breast. Inside they seemed to rely mainly on hot water, steam and hand grenades.

Crossing over to the Tribune office, one was met by a sturdy printer with muskets in hand, at the entrance. The counting room doors and windows were filled with bundles of printing paper, and barricades of boards across the second story windows prevented the possibility of throwing combustibles through them into the building. Up stairs, even editor and reporter, and printer, had his musket; and on the roof was a squad of sharpshooters, ready for instant service. It would have been the worst beaten mob New York ever saw that should have attempted a demonstration that night in Printing House Square.

Who are the Traitors?

The Richmond Dispatch, in an editorial article on Lee's retreat, has the following remarkable paragraph:

"There are persons who think, and have thought from the first, that the invasion of Pennsylvania was a rash and dangerous experiment, which there was no justification for having undertaken. We are not one of these. On the contrary, we believe, when the secret history of this war shall have been published, the conduct of the General will be amply justified by circumstances of which we are now, and must for a generation remain, completely ignorant."

What circumstances? And why must we remain ignorant of them for a generation? Could Northern traitors throw any light on the suggestions of their Southern ally? Can Gov. Seymour say why so much secrecy is necessary? Can Fernando Wood, or James Brooks or Vallandigham? It would seem as if this period of mystery were meant to expire with the death of men now on the stage—that not till they were out of harm's way would it be safe for Gen. Lee, even in order to relieve his military reputation from the stain of rashness, to say who invited him North, what assurances induced him to venture, and on what pledges of co-operation he risked his army in such a campaign.

When these questions are answered, possibly we may also learn a little more of the interior history of the recent demonstrations in New York in behalf of the rebellion; the fruits, as the Dispatch says, which the Woodhulls, every one at all conversant with the facts, knows that Mr. Greeley's conduct was precisely what it should have been. He was at his place, in his office and conforming to his usual habits of work. For the rest, the Tribune, after the evening its counting room war broken into, was very emphatically on a war footing.

We are not one of these. On the contrary, we believe, when the secret history of this war shall have been published, the conduct of the General will be amply justified by circumstances of which we are now, and must for a generation remain, completely ignorant."

What circumstances? And why must we remain ignorant of them for a generation? Could Northern traitors throw any light on the suggestions of their Southern ally? Can Gov. Seymour say why so much secrecy is necessary? Can Fernando Wood, or James Brooks or Vallandigham? It would seem as if this period of mystery were meant to expire with the death of men now on the stage—that not till they were out of harm's way would it be safe for Gen. Lee, even in order to relieve his military reputation from the stain of rashness, to say who invited him North, what assurances induced him to venture, and on what pledges of co-operation he risked his army in such a campaign.

When these questions are answered, possibly we may also learn a little more of the interior history of the recent demonstrations in New York in behalf of the rebellion; the fruits, as the Dispatch says, which the Woodhulls, every one at all conversant with the facts, knows that Mr. Greeley's conduct was precisely what it should have been. He was at his place, in his office and conforming to his usual habits of work. For the rest, the Tribune, after the evening its counting room war broken into, was very emphatically on a war footing.

There were still more expectations of an attack on the Republican newspaper offices last night, based upon threats and misgivings of leaders of the mob; and so I went around to Printing House Square again about ten o'clock. A glanced showed that the mob that should attempt anything there would be more than usually fool-hardy. In front of the City Hall was a battery of artillery, and a couple of regiments were in the immediate vicinity, while the police were also out in strong force.

The Times was not disposed to hide its light under a bushel, mob or no mob. Partly with the design of saying to the mob: "Here we are, gentlemen; this is the New York Times office, if you want to try mobbing it;" and partly with a view of lighting up the square, so that the movements of the rioters could be distinctly seen, if they should come down, both points of the building were illuminated; scores of gas-jets on either one formed a blazing "N. Y. Times" sign, and one side they had a huge eagle of gas-jets, with a blazing "Union" across its breast. Inside they seemed to rely mainly on hot water, steam and hand grenades.

Crossing over to the Tribune office, one was met by a sturdy printer with muskets in hand, at the entrance. The counting room doors and windows were filled with bundles of printing paper, and barricades of boards across the second story windows prevented the possibility of throwing combustibles through them into the building. Up stairs, even editor and reporter, and printer, had his musket; and on the roof was a squad of sharpshooters, ready for instant service. It would have been the worst beaten mob New York ever saw that should have attempted a demonstration that night in Printing House Square.

Who are the Traitors?

The Richmond Dispatch, in an editorial article on Lee's retreat, has the following remarkable paragraph:

"There are persons who think, and have thought from the first, that the invasion of Pennsylvania was a rash and dangerous experiment, which there was no justification for having undertaken. We are not one of these. On the contrary, we believe, when the secret history of this war shall have been published, the conduct of the General will be amply justified by circumstances of which we are now, and must for a generation remain, completely ignorant."

Missouri—Gen. Schofield's Position.

The absence of active military operations in this state, afford ample room for the development of many questions for the vexation of our military commanders. Gen. Schofield is at this moment, trying to steer clear of the shoals of faction and party, but it must be admitted that he does not succeed at all. Collision with one or the other is inevitable. The conservative Union men of Missouri, as they call themselves, talk very much like the rebels, about all who believe in the radical treatment of the slavery question. The influences which combined to procure the removal of Gen. Curtis, have assumed full sway over his successor, and Gen. Schofield is, at this moment, not to be envied.
