From Charleston---Progress of the Siege.

The correspondent of the New York Times, writing from Morris Island on the 14th inst., gives the following account of

REBEL OPERATIONS:

Day and night, but mostly at the latter time, the rebels continue to fire at our men in the trenches. Forts Sumter, Johnston, Gregg and Wagner, all have a hand in the attack, and neither of them succeeds in inflicting any great amount of damage. Fort Wagner is always the first to give up the attack, in consequence of the active movements of the Monitors, which immediately run up to within a certain distance, and then commence throwing those useful shells, which the rebels have long since learned to regard with extreme terror. Fort Gregg has a little longer breath, but subsides in a natural manner when two or three of our guns are turned upon it with serious intent. Forts Sumter and Johnson appear to be the only works that are really persistent in their efforts, and they fire very irregularly, sometimes sending a dozen shots an hour, for two or three hours, and then remaining silent for half a day.

If the rebels only knew how little injury they inflicted, they would doubtless cease to thus use their ammunition to such vain purposes. As if apprehensive of the ultimate fate of Sumter, the rebels have closed nearly all the embrasures of that work, and removed several heavy guns to James Island. There they have mounted them on earthworks erected a short distance to the right of Fort Johnson. The interior of Sumter has been flooded to a certain depth, and then filled with sand, making a portion of it almost, if not quite invulnerable. A number of guns are placed en barbette, which impresses us with the belief that only those guns will be used in the next attack, although it is possible that the two or three casemate guns now in position will be brought into action. It is observable that the rebels are working like beavers on all their works, evidently aware of the great importance attached to the result of the impending battle.

According to the sentiments of the Charleston Press, the only hope the enemy has for retaining that city is by making a determined assault upon our fortifications, and driving us from the island at the point of the bayonet. But Gen. Beauregard, although he may entertain the same opinion, has intimated to the bewildered inhabitants that it is quite impossible to achieve what they so much desire The National troops gained possession of Charleston when they drove the enemy from Morris Island. That fact has been partially admitted by the rebels; and the time is rapidly approaching when the National colors will float from the public buildings, and another port of entry be thrown open to the commerce and enterprise of the Northern people.

A letter from the special correspondent of the New York Tribune, dated Morris Island, August 15th, gives an interesting summary of the operations on our own side. He thus speaks of the heat of the weather, and how well our Northern troops and the negroes endure it:

One hundred and five to one hundred and ten degrees in the shade to-day on Morris Island, quite tropical enough for the most ardent lover of the Southern clime, is it not? But our Northern troops endure it well. Nothing but the severest labor in the trenches seems to effect them. Fevers are scarcely heard of. Sickness from fatigue and exhaustion, and occasionally from sunstroke, are all that the physicians are called upon to administer for. The negroes stand fast and jolly under this intense heat, and drag the big siege guns through the deep sand and under the blazing sun without the least murmuring. True, they do not drag them very fast. Four miles a day to a Northern man would seem slow progress; but, nevertheless, in this climate it is progress, and quite as rapid as the engineers care to have it.

It is worth a trip to Morris Island to see these dusky soldiers, after having worked all night and until nearly noon in the day, lie down in the hot sand on their backs with their mouths wide open, and swarms of flies hovering in and around them, sleep as soundly as if they were upon the most comfortable mattresses and beneath the coolest shade.

SEVERE AND OBSTINATE CANNONADE.

Yesterday morning the severest and most obstinate cannonade of the campaign came off, but with as usual in all these great expenditures of ammunition, very little loss of life or limb.

The night before we had advanced our lines on our right to within 420 yards of Fort Wagner without the least knowledge or suspicion of the rebels. In the morning, to their surprise, they found that we were within easy rifle range of every man who lifted his head above the parapet of the fort, and at our leisure could drop their artillerists as they came out in sight to work their guns.

In advancing our lines we had anticipated and prepared for an obstinate resistance, but had met with none, and had been entirely successful. It seemed, however, to almost every one, that it could hardly be possible that they would allow us to continue our work unmolested much longer, and such in a few hours proved to be the case.

While our men were at work in the trenches and our mortars were firing at intervals of half an hour, Forts Wagner, Sumter and Gregg opened a most terrible fire from all the guns they had bearing upon our extreme right and left. It was the most rapid firing heard in this department since the repulse of Dupont from Fort Sumter. Fort Wagner threw, for two hours, a constant stream of 42 and 30-pounder grape and canister and spherical case shot, and Sumter and Gregg their heaviest shot and shell.

Col. Bell, of the 6th New Hampshire, commanded the front during the engagement, and the moment it opened ordered all our mortars and 30-pounder Parrotts to reply, which they did instantly in splendid style. After the heavens had trembled for more than two hours, and just as the sun was rising in golden glory on the ocean, the fire from Fort Wagner began to slacken. Fort Sumter's ebb seemed to grow weary, and little Fort Gregg was evidently completely exhausted. The rain of shell from our mortars had been too much for them, and though we may not have destroyed many lives, we had demoralized their gunners and compelled them to seek the shelter of the bomb-proofs. Our own men being well protected during the whole engagement, we lost but one man killed and eight wounded.

REINFORCEMENTS.

Reinforcements are rapidly arriving. Gen. Gillmore has now all the troops he desires. In a few days the final attack upon these formidable structures will be made, and in a few weeks thereafter the whole world will know whether we have been able to reduce them or not.

A 200-POUNDER PARROTT OPENS FIRE.

To-day all the rebel forts from Johnson on the left to Wagner on the right have been firing at intervals of fifteen minutes, and we have replied from our mortars with the same rapidity.

For the first time since the siege commenced we opened fire upon Fort Sumter, and for the first time in the history of siege operations brought to bear a 200-pound Parrott.

Col. Turner, Chief of Gen. Gillmore's staff, desiring to test the powder to be used in these guns, experimented with a few shots upon Sumter, with the most gratifying results. He fired seven shots—the first three fell short; but of the remaining four, two went directly through the gorge wall of the fort, a short distance above the sally port, and two struck the parapet, and sent an immense amount of brick and mortar tumbling into the ditch and into the fort. The effect of these shots can clearly be seen with the naked eye at a distance of two miles and a-half.

The solid shot which went through the fort made holes from four to five feet in diameter, or, to use the technical language of the engineers, the diameter of the orators, by mathematical calculation, is four feet and ten inches.

After the range had been obtained upon Sumter, every shot struck. When all the 200-pounders open, if handled with the same skill, it would seem hardly possible for the fort to stand twelve hours bombardment. It cannot otherwise than fall within the time required to reduce Fort Pulaski.

While we were firing upon Sumter this afternoon, an officer in Fort Gregg, evidently designing to watch the effect of the shot, brought his camp chair out upon the parapet of the fort, and sat down as coolly as if he was not within the range of 50 or 60 Parrotts. One of our artillerists, desiring to teach him a lesson in prudence, let fly a 20 pounder Parrott shot, and sent him tumbling off his chair into the fort. Our gunners are using these small Parrotts with almost as much skill as the sharpshooters do their rifles, and are competing with them in the taking off every head that appears in sight.

THE CAPTURE OF CAPT. PAINE.

In my last I mentioned the capture of Capt. Paine, a valuable scout, who through this campaign had been of great service to Gen. Gilmore in obtaining accurate information of the enemy's movements. The facts with regard to his capture are as follows: He started out in a small boat with a sergeant and eight men to go to the old wharf on Light House Creek, where the enemy had attempted to erect a battery. A picket boat, manned by a detachment of the 47th Pennsylvania, accompanied Capt. Paine to guard the water approaches to the wharf from the Rebel lines. Capt. Paine reached the wharf in safety, and leaving his boat and crew at the end of the pier, took a position on the dock, where he could observe the movements of the enemy, and signal to our batteries, in case any Rebel steamer attempted to communicate with Cummings Point.

He had been there quietly for an hour, when he was summoned to surrender by a rebel up the dock. To gain time he asked "What is that?" and started for his boat. The rebels, for such they proved to be, fired a volley at him, and instantly a large party started in pursuit. Capt Paine jumped into his boat and his men poured in a fire upon the enemy. One or two of them were hit, and the pursuit for a moment checked, but only for a moment, for they soon rallied and dashed upon Captain Paine and his little party before the latter could load their pieces

Capt. Paine and his party were then taken prisoners. The boat escaped and came in to report the facts. The loss of Capt. Paine at any time would have been a serious one, but at this time it is almost irreparable. He was a brave, skillful and shrewd officer, and the very best scout in this department. A narrative of all the dangerous scouts he has been on would fill a volume.

The Military Situation---Advantageous Position of Banks' Forces.

The following article from the New Orleans Era of July 28th explains briefly but lucidly the advantageous position in which General Banks has placed his forces in Louisiana. It corrects several errors which have obtained, and shows that our army holds all it has gained:

The vital part of an army is its legs. Its brain and belly are consuming powers. There can be no doubt of the valor of the troops of the Department of the Gulf. There are too many battles upon the record, and the losses we have sustained prove at once the well-sustained energy of our army, the strength of the enemy and the severity of the contest. Irish Bend, Fort Bisland, Vermillionville, the plains, and the vigorous though unsuccessful assaults upon the almost impregnable walls of Fort Hudson, would not disgrace a veteran army. We need not refer to the disadvantages of new troops, and limited terms of service, as an apology for the army. It is doubtful, however, if it has not accomplished more important results by the number and celerity of its marches than by the bloodiest of the battles it has sustained and won.

The impression conveyed to the Northern press by certain correspondents in this quarter, that the Lafourche and Teche districts, commonly called the Attakapas country, have been abandoned by our army, and are recovered by the rebels, is entirely without foundation, and could have been suggested only by an imperfect comprehension of the situation. An army may control without occupying a country. This is the happy result which has been accomplished by our arms in these extensive districts. The force under command of General Banks was not sufficient to justify holding the numerous positions which have fallen into our hands. Instead of providing for an indefinite number of garrisons, military necessities have suggested the evacuation of several posts, which could be otherwise held; but they have been and still are in our control. A wise disposition of military forces is one that covers the largest extent of country with as few detachments of garrisons as possible. Our troops have been withdrawn from numerous isolated positions for the purpose of concentrating their entire force, as near as possible, in one column, at the same time covering and controlling, by strategic movements, all the positions which were apparently abandoned. This is true of every post we have held, with the exception of Galveston—too far removed from the operations of the Army of the Gulf to receive benefit from the most skillful military dispositions, it could only be retained by the concentration of a naval and military force superior to any that the enemy could collect and hurl upon it, and for this reason ought not to have been assumed.

Let us look at the operations in the Teche country. Our forces crossed Berwick's Bay with about the same strength as that of the enemy in front. He was driven from Berwick City and his works at Bisland; his navy destroyed, and his army dispersed, its scattered forces moving towards Texas and Northern Louisiana. Until our forces occupied Opelousas, the Bayou Teche was their line of communication. When this rapid march to Alexandria was accomplished, this entire line of communication by the Teche was abandoned. It was this movement that defeated the purposes of the enemy, who intended by a flank assault to cut off our communication and supplies and thus force our army to retreat. But it nevertheless enabled us to control the Teche country, although we ceased to occupy
