

A Scope of Yankee Life

Mother took on when I bid her good-bye, though I told her I would stay over a fortnight, that had a great deal to give up after all; but I had told the folks I was going to Boston, and had promised to bring Nancy, a new comb, so I stuck to my resolution and jogged on. When I began to feel lonely, I pulled out some of mother's doughnuts, and kept on eating till I had had a whole pocketful, so I didn't want any dinner that day. I went on without stopping only once to get a drink of cider, and a good piece after dark. Then I didn't find a tavern, hardly, so I thought I would stop and inquire. I knocked at a house where there was a bright light.

"Walk in," said the man of the house, in a voice rather cross I thought. "How far is it to a tavern?" "A voice a chair," said I. "I can't get into it, I've got a little behind, I believe it is a tavern, but I don't know how far it is to a tavern."

"Where you going?" "To Boston." "What are you going to Boston for?" "I'm going for a number of things. I guess—tant worth while to go into particulars."

"What you doing to Boston for?" "I've come from the north-east about a day's walk." "That's away towards Pennsylvania. Do you know Deacon Job Squiggles, who lives in the north-east about a day's walk?"

"No, I don't know Deacon Squiggles, but I sold him a yoke of steers the other day—maybe you've seen 'em—the high ones, with the off one pretty near black, with a face."

"No, I don't know 'em, but I've heard tell of 'em. How far did you say it was to a tavern?" "I don't know Deacon Squiggles, but I sold him a yoke of steers the other day—maybe you've seen 'em—the high ones, with the off one pretty near black, with a face."

"Well, I hope you'll see it, I was just a going to say, but I thought it would be long, and I never was saucy to an old man."
