BEW YORK EXPRESS.

From the interesting London correspondence of the New York Commercial, we have gleaned som

Landscape gardening is carried to great perfec-tion about London, and a large proportion of the shrubbery consists of evergreens—such as holly, laurels, lanrustinas, arbor vitres, and that fine old plant, the ive green plant, the ivy green.

Although the season is far advanced, [October 21,] owing to the humidity of the climate, the face of nature presents the aspect of eternal Spring,—the fields and the laws are still rich in vivid green, kept in a state of great beauty until Christmas, and

"Around London, for miles, the environs are studded with villa houses, all distinct and of different styles of architecture; the material is brick, covered with stone colored plaster, which contrasts harmoniculty with the virid green of the shrubbery and the bright gravel walks, which are kept in order even in the depth of Winter.

The houses generally in these numerous and extensive avenues or streets are not designated by numbers, but by numer-such as Elenheim Lodge, Mariborough House, Argyle Cottage, &c.

This matter of varying the style of architecture, of suburban cottages and villas, is one of no small

One of the amoning on dits of the day, is, a visit of a party of the National Geards now in London to the Comte de Nemilly at Claremont, to offer the could not present them to his illustrious consort, in consequence of indisposition—but said he would take much pleasure on a future occasion, if they wond take much pleasure on a future occasion, if they wond favor him with a call, of introducing them to compositions the said he would take much pleasure on a future occasion, if they wond favor him with a call, of introducing them to composition of the Prince and Princes of Saxe Cobour.

The Prince subsequently became the King of the Beigians; after the decease of his first wife, Princes Charlotte, daughter of George IV, he married a daughter of Louis Phillippe, and this will explain the reason why the ex-King of the French is now residing at Claremont.
