terday, in a long and elaborate article, controverts compositions of the Gazite, in relation to the doty of the citizens of Pittsburgh in regard to our Eastern and Western Railroade.

Before porceeding to a brief reply, which we shall make, however, in a very general manner, we wish to say, distinctly, that we never have, and do not now, oppose the Central Railroad. We emble do not now, oppose the Central Railroad. We emble the dot of the North American, who are complained of by the Journal, take the same phatically duclafin all sur h intentions. We view it with no little state pride, and watch in progress with exceeding interest. No one can be more surjourned to the state of its appeals of its speedy completion, or more desirons to promote so desirable a result, provided it shall not thereby interfere with a work still more important. ern Road, she is brachtting Philadelphia as much journay lie was upset in a stage near Cumber-land, and that his right arth had not recovered . For the Pittsburgh Gazette. Sir Issac Mewton. A scholar walked upon the shores of Time And cast his thoughts afar, And read the many mysteries sublime Of sun, and moon, and star.

And Hermit Science in his haunts of old Grew pale behind his flight, And tales of evil in the shades were told, And whisp rings heard at night.

The weaker spirit that had never soured Beyond the middle air, Started to hear the vast unknown explor'd By one that wander'd there.

While Supersition from her dim retreat Turned up her scornful eye; And Evil trembled on his gory seat, And Doubt prepared to die. But neither passion in the schoolman's breas Nor searn which folly caught, Nor strange complainings in the night expre Could change his glorious thought.

A Master Thinker, whose illumin'd soul;
Shone with a lofty lore;
Under the teachings of a bright centrul
fle moved in light above, Telling of wonders which the common Fail'd in its range to view—Teiling of glories in the azure sky,
