VOL. XVII. NO. 155.

THE CROSS DAILY

THE WIFE TO HER HUSBAND.

Shall we grow old together, And will thy gentle hand Guide me ad Into the silent land?

Will love bend o'er our foreheads When time hath revelled there, And laid his soiling fingers On each rich tress of hair?

Shall we yet cling together, When age bath marked us well, When memory's silver lute lies hush'd And broken in its cell?

Will our hearts see each other With faces young and fair, No lines of beauty there?

Shall we lie down together, When life hath spent its tide, And become a heavy garment That we long to lay aside?

Than terror aketched in youth, When the grave seems beautiful in rest,

Shall we both aleep together On earth's ambitious breast, When the pale shade of memory, Will hover o'er our rest?

Where the cold moon will linger Upon our mutual grave, Till time shall whelm our ashes In his oblivious wave?

Shall we go up together, Before the throne of God, When the great trump of judgment Upheaves the teeming sod?

There shall we reign together With Christ, our sacrifice, And share the never-fading fruit,

That grows in paradise? Washington, D. C., Oct. 1849. THE SAINT'S REST.

MY MIN H. P. COTES. Balmy Sleep hath o'er him spread To her calm dominion. He forgave and blessed his focus, Ere he sunk to slumber; And he now forgets his wose, Sweetly thus the saint shall rest! Not a hope forsaking.

Not a hope forsaking.

Not a pang to read his breast.

When life's cord is breaking.

He will drop this mortal going. Now so worn and hoars it was Now so worn and make a hiss.

And, an angel, walk the akies.

Clothed with life and glory.
