The editor of the Post says—in a rejoinder to our expression of a fear that the iron strike, in its effects, would be the cause of no little distress—that a "Paddler requests him to state, that there is no distress, and not likely to be any, while the clitisess of Pinsburgh, and elsewhere, continue to eat as liberally as they have heretofore."

There may be no distress, as fare as the Post's informant is aware of, but that there is not likely to be any is woot very certain. Even if that portion of the "strikers" who are without faints are willing to live on charify, when they have the means of ceirning an independent livelihood, as the Post's informant intimates, yet it is not certain the Post's informant intimates, yet it is not certain
