Our correspondent reverts to a sentiment supposed to be couched in the above quoted remarks of Mr. Seward, as follows:

"Mr. Seward's speech has made no little sensation. It certainly was most objectionable in this, that the distinguished Senator sat up a will or a sentiment, derived from what he called the moral law, or the will of the creator, superior to the constitution, and which would justify a citizen or a statesman in disregarding the constitution.
For one I can subsente to no such doctriar, whether proceeding from Whiger Democrat."

And contained and the contained points and the conclous and growing regions, already counting recourse. The mercantile travel from that "nor ern hive" going east has many inducements t touch both Cincinnati and Pittsburgh, in preference to taking the Lake route. I venture to assert that if the line of rail road now so nearly finished along the Lakes from New York to Chicago was complete, and the other passing through the capital c Indiana, and by the city of Pittsburgh to Phili delphia, was also complete, the latter would num ber the greatest annual amount of travel, and from coming less in competition with the waters, and not following their course, would do the greatest amount of transportation. Chicago has a stron-desire to coanect herself more directly with the Ohio River. Destined to attala a large population and to become the mart of a great commerce, st will—unities St. Louis—always so use any, never the rival of Pittsburgh. Chicago is an hundred miles or more from the eastern borders of the great, "Illinois coal field," and can never become a manufacturing city.
