But with all my infidelity, let me context that I have ever held to the practicability of the acheme. Why should not man navigate the air as well as the water? The air is his peculiar el ment, the breath of his nostrils, and it is the chie power to which all others are but subsidary, of them who gd down to the sea in ships. Indeed, men have for a very long period navigated the sir.

men have for a vory long period navigated the sir, but without a rudder; that has been the great diffeoulty. This Mr. Pennington, if that be his name, says he has found the radder. That the rudder will be found, if it be not in this case, I have to doubt, for it is, after all, only the bird's tail. He wings were discovered in the balloon three quarters of a century ago.

But I left Babel in the midst of a roar of preparations for a genuine undoubted humburg—the Castife Chardon meeting. But I pospene my intended remarks upon that until my next, when I will intrinsh my promised sketch of the political campaign in New York, this fall.

near Potugui

"At one of the public houses, the pilrrims—of whom three thousand were assembed at Hergott—spent the night 12 eating and drinking. While taking the fish the oven took free. Behind the inn were a number of stables and barns, in which hundreds of pigrims were reposing, and almost all perished in the flames, which row so rapidly through the tatched roofs, and were fanned by a strong wind, that there was no possibility of rating ladders to attempt to reace a single individual. Many threw themselves from the loits, and with broken limbs, half consumed with fire, reached hither and whither with the most pitcous crites. Not a single engine was in the place. Senecily half the pigrims were saved, and those who have sarvived have for the most part been injured. The bodies of the dead were found boused to a cinder. It was a ongit never to be lorgotten.
