Practice. We have had much to say upon the benefits of using lime and clover upon worn out soils, to give them a start. And yet we are apprehensive that many of our readers have regarded the matter as mainly theoretical, and will not be induced to try it. Although agriculture is admitted to be a tentative art, some things are settled as well as they ever can be by any amount of experiment. Among them is the utility of applying lime to soils that have not already enough of it, and cropping with clover to add vegetable matter and ammonia to thin, light soils, or those that do not give remunerative erops. In a recent trip over the line of the New Jersey Central Railroad. we saw abundant evidence of the reno vation of worn-out farms. Thirty years ago these farms were unproductive, and many of their owners were anxious to sell out at thirty dollars an acre and emigrate. It was difficult to sell at any price. No one will have to go far to find a more beautiful farming region then stretches from Plainfield, N. J., to Easton Pa. Farmes are worth from $125 to $200 per acre, and are constantly increasing in value. It is true some of this rise is cue to the railroad, which affords better facilities for marketing, but the most of it is owing to the better management of the land. They make more of clover than in regular Pennsylvania rotations, as it comes in oftener. The rotation is: 1, corn upon a clover sod, limed: 2. oats; 3, wheat, with the manure of the farm; 4, clover, to be cut or pastured. The farmers in all this region attribute the great change in the value of their lands to this rotation. The crops are luxuriant, and the wheat fields as promising as in any part of the West. In all the better farming districts of Pennsylvania, similar results are mani fest. Clover and lime, in connection with the manure upon the place, keep the farms in good heart, and constantly improving. The average production of wheat and corn in these districts is much higher than in the Western States, which had a richer soil. Wherever this treatment of the soil has been introduced, it secures the can be considered as pertaining merely to the theory of agriculture. Yet the States continue to raise clover in small views, both of the theory and practice of agriculture.
