Every one was thinking of the scenes just passed and waiting for the next turn of the screw. When in this decorous and dignified manner the election of Grant was announced. Wade. the marplot, completed the farce as follows: "The Senate having finished the business that brought them here, the General George D. By coneent, Mr. Colfax made a statement, in very moderate terms, regretting the scene and sustaining the rulings of Wade as being the only ones he could make under the joint rules. Butler then spoke for forty minutes, very carnestly and fluently, declaring that as things now stood that either House could block an election for President, by refusing to allow what votes they disliked to be counted, and that as Wade ruled he might have as arbitrarily declared Seymour elected after New York and New Jersey had been counted, and then refused to entertain an appeal from his decision, only revolution being then a resource to right the wrong. He annimadverted on Colfax's order to the Sergeant-at-Arms saving that in the Joint Convention Colfax was no more than a member ef the British Parlament the members down the Speaker in his chair to make him do his work, and that the Speaker should have ordered the constabulary intruded after the broaders hints had bosened and was thrown hide been given them to retire, as the House wanted to consult by and for themselves. Butler spoke as a and Wade were the richest things since the row between him and Bingham. Leaving Mr. Dawes in the chair, Mr. Colfux replied in direct, severe, and very parlamentary terms, repelling Butle.'s hints and vindicating his worthy uncle. The members all left their seats and crowded around Colfax and Butler very quickly. The sympathy of the House was with Colfax personally, and yet against Wade in every respect, and in that direction was with Butler. An adjournment carried the affair over till to-morrow. when the division will continue, headed by Butler on one hand and Colfax on the other. Now it is nip and tuck between them. The point in favor of the equal independence of the House which has been outraged in the mighty person of Butler, carries much in his behalf. On the other hand, Colfax makes it a personal, if not a family matter, that Wade be let alone, and he is using his personal influence, as he did to-day in his speech, to that end. The Senators to-night feel as if they had been wounded in the House of their friends, and they wonder that Butler did not try his teeth on some of fight and whip the dog, in dog fashion, shaw District, S.
