and made and paid for all his own prescriptions. In spite of all his precautions the sailor grew worse, and at last the doctor told him he must die. The man was deeply affected and wept bitterly. Death came over him slowly Cloths, Camimeren, & Veryland On his dying bed, with tears in his eyes, he thanked the doctor for all his kindness, and said that he could and would repay him for all his trouble. In a few short breaths he told him that in his younger days he had been a pirate. With twenty companions he had shipped at Callao on a Spanish treasure ship bound to Cadiz. When five days out they rose and butchered the officers and passengers, after which the course of the ship was changed due west. Three weeks afterward, during a drunken caronsal, the ship ran upon a reef of rocks fringing and island in the Pacific, and before morning eight of the bucaneers were drowned. At the break of day they reached the shore in boats, and found the island fertile and pleasant. After three days' hard work, they a country store, such as brought the kegs of silver dollars to the shore, and buried them. The treasure amounted to over $10,000,000. As water was scarce, and the provisions on the wreck were totally damaged the twelve pirates took to their boats, and steered for the coast of South America. Nothing was ever heard from one of the boats, and it was probably swamped in a great storm which occurred three days after they had left HARDWARE, the island. The provisions in the other boat soon gave out, and the men gradually became delirious for want of sustenance. Two jumped overboard and were drowned. One of their companions died in the boat, and a fourth was killed by his comrades, who drank his blood. After drifting under a burning sun for two weeks, the survivors were picked up by a passing vessel.

One of them died on the following day, and the other lived to tell his story to hundreds of incredulous listoners, and to seek in vain for the means to return to the island. He was now about to end a life of disappointment in death. At the conclusion of his story the dying sailor drew from under his bolster a roll of papers giving the latitude and longitude of the island as near as possible, and handed HARDWARE, QUEENSWARE them to the doctor; but before the physician could examine them the old sailor died. The most of the party were old Californians, and were used to a life of adventure. Among the party was one George Cummins a man of large experience who had accompanied one of the previous expeditions.
