"The lateness of the hour at which the message of President Grant was received, prevents an extended notice of its varied contents. Whilst nothing original or striking was anticipated, it tions deeply affecting the interest of the nation, would be presented with the frankness, directness and brevity of the soldier, if not with the logical precision of the statesman. But no reader will rise from its perusal without a feeling of disappointment. Instead of the terseness and brevity which was expected, the message is long-winded and ungainly in style and phraseology. The President approaches their discussion with the timidity, vacillation and restraint which a man feels who has no fixed opinions of his own, and is desirous of pleasing the politicians of all factions in his party. For the purpose of placing Georgia again in the hands of Congress, and compelling a ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment, he recommends that the Governor of that State be authorized to convene the old legislature.
