The Little Graves.

There is nothing more suggesitye of pure thoughts and sacred meditations than the little grave in the church yard. Remarkably so is a cluster of tiny green mounds in beautiful Greenwood. Scarcely aname designates the silent infant sleepers below, but here and there fond hands have placed the toys that gladdened their hearts and brightened their eyes ere yet the Heavenly Shepherd had called them to his fold. They are the depositories of mothers, sweetest joys-those half unconscious buds of innocence-flowers of humanity nipped by the earliest frost of time, before the cankerworm of pollution had nestled intle embryo petals. Callous must be the heart of one who can stand by those grave-sides, and not feel the holiest emotions of his soul begun, and life ended—ended without a trial, and without a stain.
