Three Eastern Tales.

In olden times, it used to be a very favorite pastime among learned men, especially in the East, to propound ab struse or intricate questions to one another, or, as they phrased it, to place each other "between the horns of a dilemma." One of the most celebrated of the Oriental "dilemmas" has also a remote ant:quity. A famous lawyer taught a pupil the art of pleading, on condition that he should be paid for his services when the pupil had obtained his first victory in the law-courts. The pupil, however, brought an action against his master, tract; saying to his old instructor, by way of "propounding a dilemma."-

"If I win, the authority of the court our contract." To this the learned doctor successfully replied by the following antag onistic dilemma :-"If you gain your suit, you must pay me according to our agreement; and if you lose, the court will vindicate its own authority, and compel you to fulfil its judgment." In this case, the doctor certainly had the best of the argument: but in

From the Lima (Mo.) Democrat of July 2 Terrible Encounter with a Rattlesnake.

We are informed that during the late harvest, a farmer in the northeasern portion of Osage county, while cutting wheat in his field, heard the sing of a rattle snake. Before he could determine the exact locality of the "rattling," the snake made at him. leaping over the scythe and cradle, but missed the man, who now in turn, attacked the snake with his cradle. The snake was ready for the charge, and again leaping over the cradle, inflicted a severe wound on the front part of the right leg of his antagonist, who now retreating endeavored to defend himself against the repeated attacks of the reptile. The snake made no less than ten different punges at the gentleman while retreating, who, at the same time, called loudly for his dog.

The faithfu! animal finally arrived, finding his owner nearly exhausted with heat and pain, and at onec at-tacked the snake. The farmer, fully realizing the great and imminent danger of his wound, now made his way home—a quarter of a mile—as best he could. On reaching there he at once applied a thick ligature heavily soaked in tobacco juice and salt, and whilst awaiting medical aid, drauk two quarts of peach brandy, scarcely feeling any effects therefrom in his excited and exhasted condition.
