CRAZY JANE. Why, fair maid in every feature. Are such signs of fear expressed; Can a wandering wretched creature With such terror fill thy breast? Do my frenzied looks alarm thee; Trust me sweet, thy fears are vain. Shun not then poor crazy Jane.

Dost thou weep to see my anguish, Mark me and avoid my woe; When men flatter, sigh, and languish, Think them false, I found them so. Once I loved, Oh so sincerely, None could ever love again; But the lad I loved so dearly, Stole the wits of crazy Jane.

Fondly my young heart received him, Which was doomed to love but one; He vowed, he sighed, and I believed

He was false, and I undone. Since that hour has reason never, Never cheered my heart again; Henry fled, with him forever Fled the wits of crazy Jane.

And now forlorn and broken hearted, And with frenzied thought beset : Round that spot where first we started, Round that spot where first we met; Still I sing my love-born ditty, Still I slowly pace the plain; While each passer-by in pity, Cries, God help you crazy Jane.

A Vivid War Picture.

A correspondent of the Paris Journal has the following: "At Givonne I saw a vast feet deep. In it French and Prussians lay side by side; no longer enemies but brave men united in death. On a mound of earth was a General, and an aid-de-camp, I approached; and found that it was De Failly. He was an incapable officer; but he died like a soldier. The grape-shot had torn open his breast to show that he had a heart. Fragments of a shell had factured his left shoulder, entered the abdomen. shattered the thighs, and plowed into the forehead. He was so disfigured that, had I not been told that it was he, I should never have recognized him. His aid-de-camp through the head,
