BARR indicates that the movement is one of some importance, and that their object is not merely to create a sensation and getup asympathy, but that they have endured wrongs to which they can no longer submit, and for which their only remedy is to refuse to work until their domands are compiled with.

At eleven o'clock yesterday morning, a large and respectable body of men, mostly foreigners, German, English, Irish and Welsh, having assembled at Brownstown, crossed the old Monongahela bridge, and marched through the principal streets of the city. They represented a goodly portion of the hardy class of men who make a living by hard labor in the mines of the valuable mineral, extending miles under ground, which contributes so much to the wealth and prosperety of our city. The procession was composed of eight lodges of an organization called the "Miner's Justice Society," who have banded themselves together
