THE QUESTION OF COTTON IN ENG-LAND, GRANGE OF SENTIMENT. When the present unhappy state of feeling between the United States Government and the rebellious Confederacy broke out, it was confidently-predicted by the latter, that the governments of France and England, would, at once, recognize their independence .--This recognition upon the part of England, at least, was considered by them entirely certain: From the latest intelligence re ceived from France, we conclude that that Government is inexorably opposed to the new R-public, while England has given no signs of wavering in her opposition to it, except what is reported to have been said a few days since by Lord John Russell.-With England, we apprehend, that the recognition of the new Confederation is simply a question of commerce. If she were entirely satisfied of her ability to procure cotton from some other quarter, she would be loud and boisterous in her denunciations of the Southern revolt. At first she did open her batteries against the seceders, and found additional cause for increasing her detests way to their homes or furloughs, or in distion of African Slavery. Reflection, however, upon the part of those who do the semble in force. thinking for Great Britain, suggested the propriety of their ascertaining the resources and ability of those in revolt, before com

The United States Government has seized all blockaded ports. But our ardent and erring countrymen should not allow themselves to be bamboosled by John Bull. Even if she is just now disposed to be so kind it is only to be cruel by and provide and in a very short time they will have plenty, independent of the Southern, conederacy Confederacy. Several months ago we remember of read ing an article in a London paper, upon this very question of England's dependence upon this country for cotton. The conclusion arrived at by the writer was, that England was totally independent of us for that article, being able to produce it in many of her own possessions. Many parts of Africa too, it is ascertaiged are admirably adapted to the growth of cotton. One region, especially known as Sherbro Island, produces an article of superior quality. The same is true of other regions there, and we may safely conclude with these facts before us that long-headed, far-sighted England has no notion of relying upon President Jefferson other cities, who have been giving information
