MARYLAND.

Sad and humiliating as is the present situation of Maryland, her people have, nevertheless, before them a still more gloomy future. If the objects of the present war were merely what the government declares them to be, we might be content to await, with something like patience, the results of the campaign. It the reconstruc-tion of the Confederacy was what the Administration really expected to accomplish by means of its fleets and armies, we might endure our present position for the little time that will elapse before the final success or failure of the enterprise in which the government professes to be engaged .-We could manage, perhaps, to bear the wrongs to which we are now subjected, if we could but have the consolation of knows ing that we should be allowed to pursue questions about the possibility of preserving the Union is settled one way or the other. But it is very evident that the Administration is now contending for something else besides a reconstruction of the Union. It realizes the fact that the restoration of the Republic is, at best, a doubtful matter; and it is looking toward the contingencies which will present themselves, when the recognition of the inde-pendence of the Confederate States becomes inevitable. The government has manifestly made up its mind that, if it cannot reduce all the secoded States to obedience, it can at least subjugate and hold some of them, together with Maryland, Kentucky and Missouri; and this it will desperately at

This may be very hard, and doubtless is annoying to her reputation and destructive to her trade; but overruling necessity and her own misconduct must square the account. The Elechange laments for the future of Maryland; we can afford no comfort unless genuine patriotism takes the place of rebellion. There can be no neutrality in this war: she cannot get out of this union unless she fights out, and proves physically stronger than the States which remain united.
