RESIGNATION OF GENERAL

between the President and Gen, Scott upon the occasion of the latter's resignation as Lieutenant General of the United States. After the reception of the resignation by the President, he and his entire Cabinet called upon the General to bid him a final adieu. His aids and others left the room where the interview was to tak place, but what did take place is known only to those who participated in the scene; the President was the first to emerge from the apart. ment, his cheek suffused with tears.-The occasion was a solemn one: the voluntary resignation of the highest military trust in the Republic, caused by the infirmities of declining years. On Saturday the war worn veteran left Washington for his home in New York, there, in the bosom of his family, to spend the remainder of his days. He is worn Lundy's Lane and conqueror of Mexico resigns his office for the sweets of privacy; having lived down detraction, his few remaining days will be free from the darts of malicious censure. The people of New York-the millions of the Empire State, will receive the infirm patriot with united affection.

The President and Cabinet appear to have every confidence in his ability and they are unques tionably able, by this time, to measure not only his resources, but the magnitude of the great work which they have entrusted to him. The alacrity and unanimity of the Administration in selecting Gen. McClellan to be the veteran Scott's successor, shows how mischievous and absurd were the thousand rumors and statements from Washington, indicating a desire upon their part to supplant him. He has now an undivided authority and the greatest incentive to successful exertion ever possessed by any soldier of his years. He has attained, without labor and at a single bound, what his predecessor spent forty years to the rebels, and they gave us some of to achieve. We hope that he may prove their buttons to sew on in place of ours. himself worthy of the tremendous trust and not become dizzy by the eminene he has so suddenly attained.

> The American Rebellion. Since I last wrote I have learned several things which convince more fully than ever before that there is not the slightest ianger that the Fnglish government will leviate from the atrictest line of peutrality in regard to the war in America. The government of Jeff. Davis may do what it pleases, and expend as much money as it an command-which, I do believe, will be very great in amount—to subsidize and certain presses in Paris and Lon

It is but a day or two ago that I had a conversation with a member of the John Russell (or Earl Russell, as he is now beginning to be called) on this subject, and I assure you that he scouted the idea that the British government has any thought of interfering with our affairs:-The same view of the matter was taken y an English nobleman with whom I had he honor to spend last Monday night .-He assured me not only that the government has no such purpose, but also that the nation would not, in his opinion, per other end of the State.
