Total in the Stat. of Virginia. The amount of small arms is said to be 898,000, which were obtained as follows:

Speaking of the arms in possession of the Confederates, the writer remarks: It is a well known fact that ever in since the rebellion broke out the rebel a States have had in England, in France and in Germany, the most active agents. Street, and in Germany; the most active agents, R BORING OIL, who have been profusely supplied with money. These persons have made mos secret of their business in those countries, but have bought up large quantities of Enfield rifles and of other muskets of the most approved construction together with Armstrong guns and rice fled cannon of the latest improved kinds So open have they been in their trans-surent and sold, actions that the agents of the Federal government employed in the same busgovernment employed in the same bins in less have frequently encountered these southern agents, and found that the arms which they intended to buy had already been secured for the South And they loaded their vessels with them in the English ports with such publicity that the circumstance was a matter of public notoriety. A GENTLEMAN, having occasion to call upon an author, found him at home in his writing chamber. He remarked the great heat of the spartment, and said it "was as hot as an oven!" "So it ought to be," replied the writer, "for it is here where I make my bread."
