Whatever may be though! or said upon the propriety of the surrender by our overnment of the rebel Embassadors here can be but one opinion among men having American hearts in their bosoms, in regard to the style of the British government's demand. Mark the cool insolence of the following, which Russell's dispatch to Lord Lyons says "alone can satisfy the British nation."

"The liberation of the four gentlem their delivery to your lordship, in order that their delivery to your lordship, in order that they may again be under British protection, and a suitable apology for the aggression which has been committed." These four lines contain the ultima-dispatch; it is an imperative demand, which the rebels were coming on "double quick." whether our "apology" to her be suffited States in the estimation of the world. We very much fear that Secretary Seward's disavowal of the act of Captain a deep moraes or swamp covered by under-Wilkes, in capturing the rebels, will not prove sufficient for the "aggression" complained of. True, that ingenious gentleman labors hard to prove that, where no insult is intended and immediately disavowed, no apology should be required, but John Bull seems determined to be the judge of her own sensibility. She says that "aggression" has been com mitted, and demands "a suitable apology;" what that "suitable" means she for the departed prestige and greatness that "there is so much violence of spirit among the lower orders of the people, and they are so ignorant of everything except their own politics and passions, so saturated with pride and vanity, that any honorable concession, even this hour of extremity, would prove fatal to its authors."

We wonder if this is the reason why prisoners? Well, Mr, Russell, the prisoners have been given up and still the government survives.
