LOVE IN KENTUCKY. [Continued from Saturday.]

Their plan was speedily arranged — Cockburn undergook to engage two or three men to accompany them. They thought the display of force would in-timidate the Colonel into submission Strange that any person could have been found to go on so desperate an errand. Perhaps But whatever

Notwithstanding, I kept my ground I did not see any reason why I should desire that Manley, or even the hare brained Cockburn should be shot. But Jake was beat on his crrand, and, after borrowing a dollar from me, set out and found some white man to accompany him. I neither helped nor hindered.

A little after sunrise Miss Celia was making her toilette, when she heard the tramp of horses; she looked out of the window and recognized her lover and Cookburn. What she felt I don't pretend to say. For afterward, when it became a matter of great importance to know, she kept her counsel. A remakably intelligent and self-possessed person she proved to be.
